NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—In a recent "private" note from Br. Smith, he informs us the field where he is, in Iowa, is opening so favorably that he doubts if he could be justified in leavit for a journey of 250 or 300 miles to Kansas, at least before fall. Truly "the harvest is great, and the laborers are few." May the Lord of the harvest soon send forth laborers into His harvest: men who seek not their own, but the things which are Jesus Christ's. If Br. Smith should go to Kansas, this summer, or the coming fall, our friends on his rout who wish to see and hear him should write him on the subject; directing their letters to him at "Alden, Harden Co., Iowa."

From La Fayette Norris.

CAMPTON, Iowa, April 21st, 1865.

BR. STORRS:—We are having a terrible snow storm in this part of Iowa to-day. The snow is from four to six inches deep; it is unprecedented for the time of year. It seems proper that I should call it our much lamented President's winding sheet; for all nature should go dressed in mourning at such an inhuman act. But I rejoice in the hope of one day inheriting a country where no murderer can ever come, and having a Ruler that no enemy can ever conquer or kill.

I am still battling for the truth, and am having some success. The meeting I referred to in my last letter was one of much interest; it was the largest congregation that had been gathered there for some time; and the most of them were attentive listeners; and I think the impression in the community is, that I "used up" my opponent's arguments. The most forcible arguments that I have to battle with are, that "it makes no difference what a man believes so he only lives right," and that "you can prove anything by the bible," (even preachers assert this); and that it is wrong to enter into discussions of the doctrines of the bible, however mild a form the discussions may assume.

A few names of us partook of the Lord's Supper at my house on the evening of the tenth. It brought my mind nearer to the cross of Christ than it was ever brought before; and I believe that every one present felt that it was good for them to be there. I shall hold some more meetings this summer, if the people will give me a hearing. By the way, the preacher, whose sermon I reviewed, was anxious to come and hear me; but he never came near, and has not filled any of his appointments since. A Freewill Baptist woman has been holding a protracted meeting here lately. She preaches scarcely any bible, but her whole cry is, Come forward to the mourner's bench. She understands her trade pretty well. She will say, "If you can't come forward just stand up," &c. I invited her to my house one day, and while talking with her, I told her I thought a preacher ought to set the rewards and punishments before the unconverted in plain bible language. She replied, that "it will not do, for christians differ as to what the punishment is."

I remain yours as ever in the blessed hope of Life eternal through Christ alone.

From our Aged Br. Jonathan Wilson.

BR. STORRS:—My health for aught I know is as good as any mortal man's can be in his eighty-ninth year. I preached yesterday in a school house a mile and an half from my residence; and I intend to supply there once in two weeks for a while. I want a little vent to my mind; for I never felt so fruitful as to the glorious truths of the gospel as now. I can say with the Psalmist, "The Lord is my Shepherd; I shall not want. He maketh me to lie down in green pastures; He leadeth me beside still waters; he restoreth my soul; he leadeth me in the paths of righteousness for his name's sake. Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil; for thou art with me; thy rod and thy staff they comfort me; thou preparest a table before in the presence of mine enemies; thou anointest my head with oil; my cup runneth over. Surely goodness and mercy shall follow me all the days of my life; and I will dwell in the house of the Lord forever."—Psa. xxiii. That is my experience. Surely my cup runneth over; blessed be the Lord for the joy I feel in heart while writing this scrap to you.

If you have a few Tracts to spare on "No life out of Christ," I will try to send something for them soon. I want them to spread in my new society which I am trying to feed. I am almost alone as to this belief. I know of no advent meetings kept up within twenty miles; so you will have to guess how good an hour's personal conference with you would be to me, if I could have; itbut God will give me patience to wait for it; it will in future life surely come.

From Polly G. Pitts.

FREDERICKSBURG, Iowa, May 26, 1865.

BR. STORRS:—I once more take my pen to address a few lines to you to let you know that we love the church of the living God, the pillar and ground of the truth. O, how glorious the word truth seems. How much the truth of God has done for me; yes, and for God's elect everywhere. Glorious truth; let it run and prevail. I can truly say that God's word is a light to my path, and a lamp to my feet, and it grows brighter and brighter every day. When I first learned from the word that man by nature was not immortal, my soul rejoiced in the light, for it exalted Jesus above every name that is named, and the only dispenser of immortality, and only to those who seek for it by patient continuance in well doing. Next come up the glorious light on the resurection and the judgment. I saw by the light of the word that we must be born from the dead by the eternal Spirit of God; the Spirit that raised up Jesus, if we would have a life as durable as the inheritance promised to Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, and their one seed, which is Christ. And the light on judgment, I can see, if Jesus should come to-day and raise the righteous dead, change the righteous living, that their judgment must precede their resurrection; and their being raised to life, determines the character of them that are left. Paul says that some will say, How are the dead raised up? Ans. It is sown in dishonor, it is raised in glory. Then if the wicked are included in the dead, universal salvation is true; but God's word determines that the wicked shall not see life O the mercy and long suffering of God to the wicked as well as to the righteous. To His name be all the praise. May God bless you in all your endeavors to spread the truth as it is in Jesus. We prize the Herald more and more. It shall have our help.

Your Sister hoping for life when Jesus comes.

From G. B. Martin.

GOLDFIELDS, Iowa, May 26, 1865.

BR. STORRS:—Brother T. W. Smith, from Alden, Hardin Co., Iowa, paid us a visit last Sunday, and preached three sermons. 1st, on the Atonement. 2d, on Life only in and through Jesus Christ. 3d, on the hope of the Gospel, and of the coming kingdom. His discourses were all able and convincing, and were well received by the audience, with the exception of two or three Methodists. One, a Class Leader, muttered some after sermon, calling B. Smith a brute beast.

Br. Smith has bought a beautiful horse and a pretty good buggy. Price of horse $140; buggy $45: has paid part on the buggy, and thinks he can pay the balance. But if the Brethren scattered abroad can help him to pay the balance on the horse, it would be received thankfully. We greatly thank those who have contributed to the payment of that horse, and hope the Lord may reward them ten fold in this life, and in that which is to come give them everlasting life.

A number of our Brethren are holding an annual meeting at Alden now. I hope they may adopt some measures to promote the cause of God, and that their labors may be as bread cast upon the waters that may be seen after many days.

The Lord is blessing Br. Smith's labors, and adding seals to his ministry. He has gathered quite a church at Alden, and the prospect is favorable here. There is a field and a harvest in Iowa, and may the Lord send forth more laborers to gather the sheaves. I need not tell you that I was glad when Br. Smith came here to preach, not having heard the truth preached for over six years.

Yours in hope of life in and through Jesus Christ alone.

From G. B. Stacy.

RICHMOND, Va., May 15, 1865.

BR. STORRS:—It is with emotions of heartfelt gratitude, that I find myself once more able to communicate with you, and that our prison walls are at last effectually broken down. O! my Brother, fearful have been the trials which many of our brethren have been subjected to, during the late contest; but God has mercifully preserved them all, and given us favor in presence of, and deliverance from the power of the powers that then was. I enclose a copy of a memorial we were under the necessity of presenting to the legislature of the State some two years ago.

I have many interesting historical documents which may now find their way to the public eye; at least to the eye of the holy brotherhood, and shall be happy to furnish you any of them that may be interesting and profitable to the sons of God. I feel like calling on all the holy Brotherhood to join me in the utterance of grateful adoration to our heavenly Father because he has so wonderfully preserved us and blessed us in the midst of all the turmoil and confusion of conflict. I have not time now to enter into details of God's wonderful dealings with myself and many others, but will in the future, if the Lord permit, report at least some of them.

Do my dear Brother write me a long letter, and tell me what has been going on since our Postal intercourse has been interrupted, and send me the back Nos. of the Examiner, and the current volume.

I am at present living in Amelia Co., and only arrived in town two days ago, and have not yet converted my little reserved store into current funds, but will remit you as soon as I can do so, which however may be some little time, because at present the necessities of the people are causing the market to be overloaded with tobacco.

And now let me conclude with the expression of the warmest christian affection and devotion to yourself and all the holy Brotherhood.

NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—We are glad to hear that the Lord has preserved Br. Stacy amidst the awful conflict of the past four years. We have sent him the first number of the HERALD OF LIFE, and from No. 20, Vol. ii., onward. As to writing private letters we have no time, and our friends must content themselves with our public efforts. Our time is all taken up, and we often find ourselves overtaxed. We hope soon to renew our intercourse with those living in the South.

A. BOYNTON, West Bataiva, N. Y., writes:—I send $2. One for "that horse" for Br. Smith, and one for tracts for him to scatter as he goes. Although he is a stranger to me, I think from what I read of him, he has the right "ring." Visiting and preaching from house to house and scattering tracts is an idea long cherished by me; and if I cannot do it, I will help another in this apostolic way. I can do but little, but I do want that little appropriated to the best possible advantage for the cause of truth; and having looked carefully and prayerfully over the matter, I felt it would be a real privilege, and I trust also acceptable to the Lord, to devote my mite as above.

No future or resurrected life out of Christ is to me like the rising sun; its beams of light and beauty shine higher and higher every time my eye of faith is directed to it. Then why should I not add my mite to advocate its rising? God bless Br. Smith, and raise up many more faithful watchmen to give the trumpet a certain sound. I am no "hobbyist;" but I do love a gospel that has no kinks in it; but whose whole warp and woof is love—LOVE DIVINE.

NOTE BY EDITOR.—The foregoing has the right "ring" in it. Let all do something to help on the truth, if it is but a mite. We want $20 more to finish paying for Br. Smith's horse. Our friends have done well in this "Horse Stock Company." Let us finish it now. Br. Smith is riding this horse to good profit. See his Reports. The Lord prosper the work.

Reconstruction.

The fate of the African in our country is as yet unsettled. Until the negro has the ballot his freedom is incomplete. President Johnson has initiated the work of State Reconstruction in North Carolina by denying the loyal blacks the right of suffrage. He favors negro suffrage, but has determined to leave the whole question to the decision of the white voters. Now if this policy will result in the speedy enfranchisement of the negro population by the reconstructed States—well; but if there is any doubt of this, then the said policy is defective, and should be met by the dissent of every Christian mind. Before the rebellion, there was no legal method of interference with slavery in the Southern States on the part of the General Government. Now the case is altered. Out of the chaotic fragments of Southern society, the Federal power is to recreate the old States. In this work of recreation, the Government is to act legally. It is bound by the statements of the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States, that all men are created equal, and are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights, among which are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; that to foster and protect this equality and rights, governments are instituted, deriving their authority from the consent of the governed; and that Congress is to guarantee to each State a republican form of government. With these august utterances before it, the Government of the United States has but one legal and just course to pursue. It must give to every loyal inhabitant of the reconstructed States a representation. No one must be debarred from his just due on any pretence whatever. "The consent of the governed" is the consent of the blacks as well as the whites. "A republican government" is a government of the people, and if the whole people are not represented in it, it is a pretence, a sham.

Thirty years ago the fifty-eighth chapter of Isaiah began to be history. Eight verses of the prophecy have been fulfilled, and June 1865 finds us standing in the middle of the ninth verse. And now we should remember the words of YAHVEH to Moses at the Red Sea. "Speak unto the children of Israel that they go forward." What is the next thing to be transferred from the book of prophecy to the historical records of the nation? We have "loosed the bonds of wickedness," we have "undone the heavy burdens," we have "let the oppressed go free," we have "broken every yoke,"—what next? We must take up the latter half of the ninth verse. We have broken the yoke of chattel slavery, but we have not taken it "away from the midst of" us. Complete enfranchisement of the freedmen is the necessity of the hour. This will remove the broken yoke, the degradation of the past, the contempt of the present. God speaks; hear ye him. "If thou take away from the midst of thee the yoke, the putting forth of the finger, and speaking vanity; and if thou draw out thy soul to the hungry, and satisfy the afflicted soul; then shall thy light rise in obscurity, and thy darkness be as the noon day." Give the negro his rights as a citizen and you take away the broken yoke; for who will dare to reflect upon the citizen with his ballot in hand? Where, then, will be "the putting forth of the finger?" where the "speaking vanity?" God waits and God will perform. He sits in the heavens to perform his strange work. In this work he uses human instrumentality. If we can do no more, we can have our hearts in full sympathy with the truth and the right. Less than this will not be acceptable. J. T. C.

Books and Pamphlets

FOR SALE AT THIS OFFICE.

On all books and pamphlets sent by mail the postage has to be pre-paid.

SIX SERMONS on the inquiry, Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the Life-giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by GEO. STORRS; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This word contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in plain binding, 50 cents; in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near ten years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER: OR, MAN IN DEATH; AND THE HOPE FOR A FUTURE LIFE.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead, can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none there fore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD; OR, THE RIGHTEOUS ONLY WILL LIVE AGAIN. By GEO. STORRS. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the EDITOR OF THE HERALD OF LIFE. Price, $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.—IMMORTALITY: The Argument from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. POST, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by GEO. STORRS. Price, in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. POST, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a Essay on IMMORTALITY, for which a gentleman New York paid $150. It was intended to have the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men, with in egard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. POST took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The REVIEWER followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The Author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

BIBLE VS. TRADITION: in which the True Teaching of the Bible is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity Life, Death, &c. Price, bound, $1. Postage 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. It is a work of much labor and research. The title indicates its object, and the performance shows the object was kept in view throughout. The language is sometimes severe on what is called "orthodoxy—more so than is desirable—but the value of the work, in general, cannot be over-estimated. Thousands of it have been sent abroad, and thousand more ought to be scattered. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subjects; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

Poetry.

NOTHING BUT LEAVES.

Nothing but leaves; the Spirit grieves
Over a wasted life;
Sins committed while conscience slept,
Promises made but never kept,
Hatred, battle, and strife;
Nothing but leaves!

Nothing but leaves; no garnered sheaves
Of life's fair, ripened grain;
Words, idle words, for earnest deeds;
We sow our seeds—lo! tares and weeds;
We reap with toil and pain
Nothing but leaves.

Nothing but leaves; memory weaves
No veil to screen the past;
As we trace our weary way
Counting each lost and mis-spent day,
Sadly we find at last
Nothing but leaves.

And shall we meet the master so,
Bearing our withered leaves?
The Saviour looks for perfect fruit—
We stand before him humbled, mute;
Waiting the word he breathes—
"Nothing but leaves."

TALK WITH THE CHILDREN.

BY AUNT LOUISA

This pleasant spring morning as I was out in my yard, there were two things that kept running through my mind. One was a passage of Scripture, where the wise man says, "He (the Lord) hath made every thing beautiful in his time." And then I thought how much I would like to have all the young readers of the Herald here, under the trees about me, that I might see their happy faces and hear them sing some of those sweet hymns, and talk with them about all the beautiful things the Lord has made.

Some of you who have always lived in the city do not know how very beautiful every thing looks at this season in the country. There is an old saying that "man made the city and God made the country," and here as we look in every direction we see something to remind us of the great power and wisdom and love of our heavenly Father.

I can look off now on the distant blue mountains and the nearer hills covered with forest trees, and still nearer on the fields and orchards putting out their green leaves, while around the house, the pear, cherry, and plum trees are white with blossoms, and every breeze that comes along scatters them like snow flakes all about me. Before you read this, probably the many apple trees will also be covered with their pink and white flowers, reminding me as I write of what I lately read of a little girl who had always lived at the far west and never saw an apple tree. When she was eight years old she came to Ohio and for the first time saw an apple tree in blossom. She raised her hands in surprise and exclaimed, "O, see God's great boquet."

Yes, children, God's boquet's are all around us—his beautiful plants and flowers,—and we, shall do well to think of it; and then the soft carpet of grass, how pleasant to look upon. Here in my yard it is thickly sprinkled with little blue, and purple violets, and is much handsomer, I think, than any carpet in the house. In the morning when I throw open the doors and windows, the air is sweet with the perfume of the flowers, and as I think of the many thousands of poor people who are stowed into garrets and cellars in our large cities, and sick ones confined in little close, pent up rooms, who never breathe the pure air of heaven, or perhaps prisoners shut up in some loathsome place or criminals who must be confined to keep them from doing harm to other people, how thankful I feel that I can enjoy so much,—that the pure air and blessed sunshine are free to all, even the very poorest in the country, and that those who love beautiful things can always find something beautiful to look at.

I think the birds and bees enjoy these things too, for they get up so early in the morning and seem so very happy. Indeed I am awakened almost every morning by a concert among the birds, and it seems as if they tried to see which would sing the loudest and sweetest;—then Pedro, my canary, wakes up and joins them.

Now, why do you suppose the Lord has made so many beautiful things? Was it merely for his own pleasure, or for our happiness? It was because he loved us and wished us to be happy, and he is doing all he can to make us love him. Some people have very erroneous views and ideas of God. They think he is a terrible being who hates sinners, and threatens them with dreadful sufferings unless they repent and serve him. This is not true, for although he does not love sin, yet he loves all his creatures and does not delight in the death of any, but rather that they would come to him and be saved. And because he loves people he sent his only Son into the world, that whosoever believeth in him might not perish but live forever. Thus he does all he can to convince people that he is good and loves them for you know that is one reason why they should love him in return. After this whenever you look out on the beautiful earth or sky, let it remind you of the love of God.

This is not all: He has promised to all who love and obey him "a new earth" where they may live forever. That will be far more beautiful than the present one, and there will be nothing there to trouble any one or make them afraid. No one will shed tears, for there will be no occasion to do so, for "sorrow and sighing will flee away." There will be no pain nor dying, nor parting with those we love. The bright flowers will not wither nor the green leaves fade as they do here. The cold winds and snows of winter will not come there nor the scorching heat of summer.

The people will hunger and thirst no more, nor will "the inhabitant ever say, I am sick." And all this because there will be no sin there. You know it was sin, or disobedience to God's law, "that brought death into the world and all our woe," and thus the Lord cursed even the ground for man's sake, but "there will be no more curse" when the earth is made new. When the Lord destroyed the old world with the flood because of sin, he promised Noah that he would never bring a flood of water upon the earth to destroy it again, and he set his bow (the rainbow) in the cloud as a sign, that people might remember the promise. He also said, "While the earth remaineth, seed-time and harvest, and cold and heat, and summer and winter, and day and night shall not cease." The returning seasons also remind us of the promise.

So the Lord knowing that people would sometimes get almost discouraged and begin to doubt if the promise in regard to the new earth would ever be fulfilled, because it was made so long time ago, reminds us of it with every returning spring, when the budding things come forth, and the earth is clothed with her new dress. And when we see the flowers spring up again, that we thought were forever dead, they too remind us of the resurrection, when the dead will live again to die no more.

When the earth was cursed the Lord caused it to bring forth thorns and thistles, and perhaps some of you know what unpleasant things they are. Well, they are a sign that the curse is on the earth. When the earth is made new, "instead of the thorn shall come up the fir tree, and instead of the brier shall come up the myrtle tree, and it shall be to the Lord for a name, for an everlasting sign that shall not be cut off." So says the prophet Isaiah. That will be a sign that the curse is removed. When the earth is thus made new and fair, Aunt Louisa hopes to meet all the young readers of this paper, if not before, when we may praise the Lord for his love and goodness, and talk of all the beautiful things which he hath made.

WORDS BY THE WAY.

I thought I would give a few words that came to me recently. Meeting a Br. one morning, the first salutation was, Good morning Br. S., how are you? where do you attend meeting now? I answered him. He said, Do they preach up that non-resurrection doctrine there now? My answer was, A part of the time it is preached. The coming of the Lord is also preached. Then he asked, Do you believe in non-resurrection of the wicked? I answered, I cannot see who is to give them life: all mankind are in death now. His reply was, It is not true. I asked, will you explain this passage, 2 Cor. v. 14, "If one died for all, then all were dead?" I had no answer from him. I said, would you explain it, Dead in trespasses and sins? I wished him to commit himself here. I asked, Did not our Lord physically die? If that was a fact, then was it not a fact also that all mankind were physically dead? Well, he believed it was down right blasphemy, and the infidel likes. I replied, The Lord was accused of blasphemy, and I will try and bear it. I remarked to him, the same was said many years ago when the doctrine of the destruction of the wicked came up. He repeated the same over again, and left me without the usual "good-by."

The above is a specimen of what we hear frequently, as we meet with those we used to walk together with to the house of God. The inquiry is also raised, Are you not backsliders, that made you take hold of such infidel doctrine? Now all this is like the man in the fable who undertook to make the boy come down off the apple tree by throwing grass at him. Let them look and study candidly Paul's meaning in the above passage; we cannot think he would mislead us in our inquiry. Is it not a fact that Paul gives the idea that all men are dead (so considered in the mind of God) on account of trespasses and sins, already condemned? Then we see the condemned awaiting execution.

What are the facts in the case of Adam? Was he not judicially and virtually dead in the day that he sinned? Physical decay commenced on him, ("dying thou shalt die"); "man dieth and wasteth away, yea man giveth up the ghost and where is he"? Job xiv. 10. Adam Clarke and John Locke hold that "Adam then began to die, by a lingering death of wasting inward decay." We see also this fact in mankind. All the life of Adam was forfeited; he was subject to death under the law of mortality, was an heir of death; that was his inheritance; his award or execution was sure to follow; he was under sentence of death; his posterity are just there. And so Jesus our Lord must have meant when he said, "Let the dead bury the dead." Though Adam lived on many years, still the sentence was on him. There was no reprieve to him nor to his posterity, except they believe on Jesus Christ. Then they pass from death unto life. Their legal condition is shifted, changed; they are exempt from that penalty. They "shall not come into condemnation;" their faith exempts them, justifies. They accepted the amnesty through the mercy of God in Jesus; otherwise how is their legal condition affected? Not at all, "the wrath of God abideth (still) on them." "He that loveth not his brother abideth in death," John iii. 14. This passage showing that the unregenerate believer's condition remains the same as in the beginning. "They will not come unto Him that they may have life." The judge in the great decision day finds them still under sentence. Their federal head Adam was to lose his existence; go back to the dust again. They following him, lose their existence; return back to the dust. "Thou takest away their breath, they die, and return to their dust." "Let the sinners be consumed out of the earth, and let the wicked be no more," Ps. civ. 29, 35. This is most likely about the purport of the decision of the judge, when he shall sit upon his throne. In the case of Adam, by what law would he be judged, supposing he should be raised to life again, as some claim? I do not find any in the record. If returning to dust and coming up to life again, to be examined for guilt or innocence of Adam, was the intention of God at some future time, where is the intimation in the Scriptures? We surely do expect that he comprehended what God had pronounced upon him; he had heard of his origin: Did he mistake the meaning? We are told that he lived 930 years and died, (returned to dust); was this all the penalty that was pronounced upon him? Now, if he died in his sins (without faith) having received all the penalty pronounced, will it be just to disturb his slumbers, and pass on his case again and repeating the same penalty? I think not. Then if Adam comes not again from the grave what becomes of the text so often quoted, John v. 29? If one individual is wanting, (that is, allowing the full meaning that is put upon it,) how stands the text, it cannot have a universal application. I have met with those persons who advanced the idea that Adam would come with the rest of mankind, and answer for sins which he committed in after life, while he was shut out from the garden. I hope never to resort to conjecture for proof on a matter so important, in searching for truth.

METEOROLOGY.

The subject of meteorology is one that should attract more general attention than it does, its laws being comparatively unknown at the present time, and even the most trifling observations, suggestions and experiments made with reference to this important science should be recorded and carefully examined and preserved. We constantly meet with persons of but little general intelligence who can predict almost with certainty some of the approaching changes of wind or weather, by carefully noticing certain indications which are known from their own and the experience of others to be generally correct. Were all the weather philosophy of farmers, sailors, fishermen, hunters, shepherds, stage drivers, and others, collected, it would constitute a volume filled in a great measure with suggestive information; and like the unavailing search after "the philosopher's stone," or fruitless experimenting in the hopes of discovering "perpetual motion," though not resulting in positive success, the very failures and disappointments experienced by the alchemist and the mechanical experimenter have been the means of opening new channels of thought in the minds of others, terminating in the wonderful discoveries of the chemist and the magnificent mechanical contrivances of modern times.

The united historical evidence from the battle-fields and naval engagements of Europe since the commencement of the present century, and of our own battle-field during the rebellion, concur in sustaining the meteorological fact that cannonading affects the atmosphere to such an extent that thunder-storms and heavy rains, or rains alone, almost always accompany or succeed where it has been for many hours heavy and continuous. This war has also demonstrated, what is of more importance to us, that heavy and continuous firing affects the atmosphere not only in its own immediate vicinity, but at hundreds of miles west or north of it, by producing within a few hours sudden, and, in most cases, unseasonable changes of the winds, usually accompanied by cloudy weather or rain without thunder-storms; and in no instance at any season for the last three years has a general engagement been immediately succeeded in this latitude by severe cold weather, the cannonading appearing to have complete control over the currents of air producing cold.

If, then, the cannonading of this war, which was confined to certain lines of latitude and longitude, produced rain in their own vicinity, and at points more or less distant, what effect would cannonading from batteries arranged across the continent on different lines of latitude, and connected by telegraph so as to notify of approaching storms, have on the atmospheric currents? Would batteries, taking St. Paul's as the line of latitude, have dispersed the cold storm of January 1, 1864, thereby preserving from destruction so many valuable animals and fruit trees, or the August frost of 1863, which destroyed half the value of the growing crops of the West? or batteries, taking Chicago as the line of latitude, check the spring frosts that so frequently annihilate our fruit and damage our wheat, after they have escaped all the perils of winter? or at what points should batteries be worked this present season for the purpose of suspending for a short period the rains which are now retarding the planting of the staple crops of the West?

Surrounding the coast of Great Britain there is a system of signals warning mariners of approaching storms, the signal stations being connected by telegraph. If connonading can disperse those storms, how much more advantageous would it be to the seamen and fishermen than to be compelled to remain in port waiting for the storms to disperse themselves.

These are all points of much interest, and are worthy of being experimented on under the supervision and control of an enlightened and unprejudiced meteorologist. Before the removal of the batteries from the vicinity of Richmond and other points it is the duty of the Government to institute a series of experiments bearing on this subject, which, if conducted systematically and honestly, will certainly, in this latitude, go to sustain the rain theory.

GREAT RAINS OF TH WEST.

All the Western rivers taking their rise in the Rocky Mountains and the great Valley of the Mississippi, and discharging their waters into the Gulf of Mexico through the various mouths and outlets of that river, inundate their banks about every seventh year, or periodically. These inundations overflow large tracts of river bottom and swamp lands in the States of Missouri, Arkansas, Tennessee, Mississippi and Louisiana, covering an extent of surface which, taken in the aggregate, makes a total equal to an inland sea of several hundred miles square. The evaporation from this immense water surface, stimulated by the tropical heat, is carried northward by the prevailing and usual warm south-west winds blowing from Mexico, until, meeting with the regular evaporation of the great Northern lakes, the atmosphere becomes overcharged with vapor, condensation follows, and the result is, that over a large portion of the Valley of the Mississippi, lying north of the mouth of the Ohio, copious and unseasonable rains prevail. This is the periodical year of the overflow; the season is unusually wet, and unseasonable rains may be looked for until the summer heats, acting on the excessive evaporation, rarifies it to such an extent that they check its descent in the form of rain, and all general overflows of the Mississippi and its tributaries are sure to be accompanied with spring and summer seasons remarkable for their wetness.

The Review of Sherman's Army.

The Washington correspondent of the Times says of the review of Sherman's army on the 24th:—

"The men who marched from the Ohio to the Tennessee under Buell, only to march back again; who first penetrated down into Alabama under the daring and nervous Mitchell; who fought at Perrysville under McCook, and checked the advancing tide of the rebellion to again send it reeling southward, at Stone River, under the chivalrous Rosecrans; who toiled over the rugged passes of the Cumberland Mountains, and seized the great natural fortress of Chattanooga; who held the left with a tenacity that saved them from defeat at Chickamauga, under the ever-victorious Thomas; who stormed Lookout Mountain, and fought above the clouds with Hooker; who cut their way from Chattanooga to Atlanta, and from Atlanta to the sea; who swept the Carolinas as with a besom of destruction, and who gave the finishing blow to the great rebellion, in following the lead of Sherman, and Howard, and Slocum—these were the men who received to-day the enthusiastic plaudits of a hundred thousand spectators.

"The interest of to-day has exceeded that of yesterday. The Army of the Potomac is our old acquaintance, but the Armies of Georgia and Tennessee few people here had ever seen. The most eager interest was therefore exhibited to view the veterans of the West, whose marches can only be counted by thousands of miles.

"The magnificent physique of the men at once elicits the admiration of all; tall, erect, broad-shouldered, stalwart men, the peasantry of the West—the best material in the whole world for armies. The brigades move by with elastic, springing step, in excellent order, and fully equal to the marching of yesterday, save that the intervals between brigades and divisions were longer, though the regiments themselves were kept well closed up. At the head of each brigade was a battalion of black pioneers, the simon-pure contraband, in the garments he wore on the plantation, with shovel and ax on the shoulder, marching with even front, sturdy step and lofty air.

"The rear of Gen. Barnum's brigade was brought up by the first genuine pack-mule train ever seen in Washington. I will warrant Barnum had an eye to letting his friends see with what a degree of comfort he travels. It was a most nonchalant, grotesque spectacle—two very diminutive white donkeys bestrode by two diminutive black contrabands. If that is not a paradox, a dozen patient pack-mules, mounted with Mexican pack saddles, camp equipage on one side and boxes of hard tack on the other; half-a-dozen contraband females on foot; a dozen contraband males leading the mules; a white soldier or two on horseback, to see that everything was all right; the servants of the mess, and the mess-kit, and, scattered about on the panniers of the mules, reclining very domestically, half a dozen game cocks, a brace of young coons, and a sure-footed goat, all presenting such a scene as brought laughter and cheers from end to end of the avenue.

"To give an idea of the length of the column, it is only necessary to state that when the rear of the Fourteenth corps passed over Long Bridge the head of the Twentieth had already crossed the river on the pontoon bridge at the foot of Twentieth street, the route being from the first-named bridge along Maryland avenue to the Capitol, around the Capitol on the south side to Third street east, along that northwardly to Maryland avenue, thence westwardly to the Capitol, passing around on the north side to Pennsylvania avenue, up this avenue westwardly by way of Fifteenth street to Twentieth street, and thence south to the river. The entire distance of this column was fully seven miles. These two corps did not embrace more than half the entire force reviewed, which would make the whole column about fifteen miles long. It required a little more than six hours to pass any given point."

The Public Debt of Great Britain.

In the budget recently presented by Mr. Gladstone to the British Parliament it is stated that on March 31, 1859, the total public debt was £825,934,000, and on March 31, 1865, it was £808,288,000—showing a decline of £17,646,000, or at the rate of about three millions of pounds sterling per annum. In 1859 the total amount of the trade with France was £26,431,000, and in 1864, £49,797,000, or nearly ninety per cent increase. The revenue for the financial year of 1864-65 amounted to £70,313,000. The expenditures were £65,957,000—showing a decrease as compared with those of 1860-61, the year of the highest expenditure, of £6,547,000 since the Russian war, but an increase of nearly twelve and a half millions as compared with the ordinary expenditures immediately antecedent to that period. The whole trade of the country, which last year was valued at £445,000,000, had increased during the year ending on the 31st of December, 1864, to £487,000,000, the imports being £274,000,000 and the exports £213,000,000. Those who argue that a preponderance of imports over exports is opposed to the commercial prosperity of a nation receive a practical refutation of their theory in these conclusive figures. The estimated income for the financial year just entered upon is £70,170,000, and the expenditures, £66,139,000.

Grafting Roses.

Grafting roses is not like grafting apples and pears; it is more of an intermediate process between budding and common grafting; the rose-grafters merely take a thicker slice of wood behind the bud than is done in budding—say a thicker and a little longer slice, and one bud only; then the stock needs only a like slice to be cut out of it, and the new bud and slice to be nicely fitted to the part without tongueing or wedging; nothing but to tie on the slice. Supposing you took a slice of bark and wood off a branch, and cut across the bottom to take it out fair, would it not be easy to stick on the same slice again, and tie it round with some soft binding? Of course it would; nothing was ever yet easier to learn in this world.

Rose-grafting is quite as easy, only you take the slice from a different branch, which is all the difference. But clever practitioners do it still easier. They cut off the head of the rose stock, and leave only a little stump out of the pot; from the top of this stump they slice off about $1\frac{1}{2}$ inch down, and make a cut across the bottom of the slice, which leaves a notch there, and on that notch they rest or fit the bottom end of the graft slice, then cut the top end of the slice square with the top of the stock, tie, and clay; sometimes they do not clay at all, but it is usual for ordinary people to put on a little clay for all kinds of grafts.

The best way to clay a rose graft and all pot grafts is, to put a lump of clay in a pot saucer and as much water as will make it into a soft paste, like very thick paint, and with a little brush paint the stock and graft all round, then dust it over with sand, which will keep it from cracking, and all is finished. Gardeners make their own brushes for this work; a bit of soft matting tied on the end of a stick like a pen-holder is all they require. When you hear of people grafting roses in-doors, the plan is still more easy. There is no pot or mold, only so many rose stocks lifted out of the ground on purpose, and any of the ways of grafting will do.—Journal of Horticulture.

Use of Waste Heat in Kilns.

A correspondent of the London Builder, who appears to be a practical man, referring to the gases arising from Portland cement, says that while it is burning in the kilns a great heat is obtained by consuming the gases, and then passing the same under a drying floor. When alight, the gases are like a rolling sea of fire, and this will travel a great distance before it requires a chimney-shaft; that is to say, if the flues are in a straight line, the heat from the gas will dry well for a distance of 120 ft. in length, and 60 ft. in width. The kilns he speaks of hold, when burnt, 150 casks. There is a greater improvement, however, which, our correspondent suggests, could be made; first, to let the heat work another set of flues while the men are taking off the stuff, and as soon as they have it off they could shut off another bay; or they might shut off nineteen flues out of twenty, and let the heat work up the one, which would be much better for men working on these hot flues. Secondly, by having a coke oven beside the furnace the gas from this would pass through the coke fire, and the coke from the oven would supply the furnace and much more heat. This plan of furnace would consume but a small quantity of coke, and could be applied to any kind of works for drying, and for material of any description, and if properly constructed would, he thinks, be preferable to any other.

Concrete Buildings.

A correspondent of the Country Gentleman says:—I find that cobblestone packed in lime mortar between boards laid on the wall raised as fast as it sets, makes a cheap and substantial building. It is rough coated on the outside, blocked off and colored in imitation of stone. No finish can excel this in beauty or durability. In the country such finish blends harmoniously with the landscape, is pleasing to the cultivated eye, and winning to the senses. I built an ash and smoke-house 8 feet square by 7 feet high, cemented at bottom, and beautifully finished, for $12. It answers every purpose for such a building. I built a boiler and hog-house, 18 feet square by 12 feet high, well finished on outside, at an expense of $50. I can keep corn in it clear of rats. I built a drying house for a keg-manufacturing company, 18 by 22 feet, by 10 feet high, at a cost of $100. It has sustained a great heat, enough to fire a wooden building, and answers every purpose. Apples could be dried in such a house to good profit. The stones were gathered from the adjacent grounds, and were of all sizes to fit in a 10 and 20-inch wall. Farm hands can work on such walls, having a master mason to direct the laborer. Where stone are plenty, buildings of this material can be reared for one-half the cost of wood. For dwelling houses strips of boards are laid up in the wall for lathing, to give an air chamber to avoid any dampness.

The Oil Regions.

A disgusted newspaper correspondent in the oil regions writes to a Cincinnati paper from Oil City:—"It is really astonishing to what indignities the people who are hunting oil will submit. The hotels are crowded and dirty. The street is one sea of diluted mud, which the struggling horses splash and splatter all over the houses and people. It is worth the price of a good suit of clothes to promenade Main street in Oil City for two days. But oil seekers do more than this. They go on foot up the creek to the 'oil diggings,' over such roads as they never before walked on. And here, too, they are subjected to the same splashing process that prevails on the streets of the city. The road is but a continuation of the streets in all respects, and the pedestrian finds every tired horse or mule on the way just in the act of stumbling over some hidden rock, at the critical moment when his blundering foot can scatter most of the diluted mud. The result of this state of things is apparent. Thousands who come to see are satisfied—no, disgusted—with the first night, and rush away by the morning train. It requires the impetus of a sure prospect of gain to induce one to remain more than a day, while only those who are making a 'pile' will consent to live here."

Subsidence of the Earth's Crust.

The commune of Buonanotte, in France, is hourly menaced with utter destruction. Five manufactories have already been overthrown, and sixty-four more are threatened with imminent ruin. The inhabitants have fled in the greatest consternation to the neighboring villages. The cause of the disaster is a sudden and violent depression of the soil, which is at the present time accounted for by one of two reasons—either the fall of an immense mass of earth in the west of the district, or the yielding of the roof of an extensive subterranean cavern. But in reality nothing certain is yet known as to the cause of this most deplorable event. A number of civil engineers have hastened to the spot, and prompt measures are in course of adoption to prevent still greater disaster.

Rate of Emigration.

The whole number of immigrants who arrived at New York City in the first three days of the week ending the 20th of May, was 4,681. Two steamers arrived subsequently, swelling the total to about 6,000. Another ship was expected, and possibly a steamer, which may bring the figures to 7,000. This is at the rate of 28,000 per month, or 336,000 per annum, at a single port, when the season for large arrivals has not commenced. That begins in June, and usually continues to October and November. We have not seen a report of the arrivals at other places; but every European steamer brings fresh intelligence of the swelling exodus on its way hither, comprehending every nation from the Caspian to the North Sea—every occupation, and that physical ability we can measure from experience.

Benzoin as an Insecticide.

As our houses and gardens are always more or less infested with vermin, it is satisfactory to know that benzoin, an article well-known as a detergent, is efficacious as an insecticide. Two drops are sufficient to suffocate the most redoubtable pest, be it beetle, cockchafer, spider, slug, caterpillar, or other creeping thing. Even rats and mice decamp from any place sprinkled with a few drops of benzoin. A singular fact connected with this application of benzoin is, that the bodies of the insects killed by it become so rigid that their wings, legs, etc., will break rather than bend, if touched. Next day, however, when the benzoin has evaporated, suppleness is restored.—Boston Cultivator.

MISCELLANEOUS SUMMARY.

THE TUNNEL RAILROAD.—Gov. Fenton has vetoed the recent act of the Legislature authorizing a company to construct an underground railroad in this city. He objects to it on the ground that no limit is assigned in which such road is to be completed; and furthermore, that the bill authorizes the transfer of State and city property for the use of the company.

A TOAD lately found by some quarrymen at Hartlepool, Eng., and announced to be 6000 years old, is declared not a myth. The Rev. Robert Taylor, of St. Hilda's Parsonage, states that the toad is still alive, that it has no mouth, that it was found in the center of a block of magnesian limestone, 25 feet below the surface of the earth, and that it differs in many respects from all ordinary toads.

ACCORDING to Dr. James Johnston, 800,000,000 of men smoke different sorts of tobacco; 400,000 smoke opium and its compounds; 300,000 hemp and haschish; 100,000 betel, and 40,000 the American plant coca.

DUTCH GAP CANAL NAVIGABLE.—The Dutch Gap Canal, it seems, has not been altogether a failure, for the Richmond Whig says that General Mulford arrived there from Fortress Monroe, having passed through Butler's Dutch Gap Canal on the steamer Clyde. This is the first steamer that has passed through.

Also, in ordering papers sent, the name of the Post Office County, and State must be given, and written plainly; and if change is called for, state the Office to which the paper has previously been sent. Unless attention is paid to all these matters, confusion and delay are inevitable.

Poetry.

NOTHING BUT LEAVES.

Nothing but leaves; the Spirit grieves
Over a wasted life;
Sins committed while conscience slept,
Promises made but never kept,
Hatred, battle, and strife;
Nothing but leaves!

Nothing but leaves; no garnered sheaves
Of life's fair, ripened grain;
Words, idle words, for earnest deeds;
We sow our seeds—lo! tares and weeds;
We reap with toil and pain
Nothing but leaves.

Nothing but leaves; memory weaves
No veil to screen the past;
As we trace our weary way
Counting each lost and mis-spent day,
Sadly we find at last
Nothing but leaves.

And shall we meet the master so,
Bearing our withered leaves?
The Saviour looks for perfect fruit—
We stand before him humbled, mute;
Waiting the word he breathes—
"Nothing but leaves."

TALK WITH THE CHILDREN.

BY AUNT LOUISA

This pleasant spring morning as I was out in my yard, there were two things that kept running through my mind. One was a passage of Scripture, where the wise man says, "He (the Lord) hath made every thing beautiful in his time." And then I thought how much I would like to have all the young readers of the Herald here, under the trees about me, that I might see their happy faces and hear them sing some of those sweet hymns, and talk with them about all the beautiful things the Lord has made.

Some of you who have always lived in the city do not know how very beautiful every thing looks at this season in the country. There is an old saying that "man made the city and God made the country," and here as we look in every direction we see something to remind us of the great power and wisdom and love of our heavenly Father.

I can look off now on the distant blue mountains and the nearer hills covered with forest trees, and still nearer on the fields and orchards putting out their green leaves, while around the house, the pear, cherry, and plum trees are white with blossoms, and every breeze that comes along scatters them like snow flakes all about me. Before you read this, probably the many apple trees will also be covered with their pink and white flowers, reminding me as I write of what I lately read of a little girl who had always lived at the far west and never saw an apple tree. When she was eight years old she came to Ohio and for the first time saw an apple tree in blossom. She raised her hands in surprise and exclaimed, "O, see God's great boquet."

Yes, children, God's boquet's are all around us—his beautiful plants and flowers,—and we, shall do well to think of it; and then the soft carpet of grass, how pleasant to look upon. Here in my yard it is thickly sprinkled with little blue, and purple violets, and is much handsomer, I think, than any carpet in the house. In the morning when I throw open the doors and windows, the air is sweet with the perfume of the flowers, and as I think of the many thousands of poor people who are stowed into garrets and cellars in our large cities, and sick ones confined in little close, pent up rooms, who never breathe the pure air of heaven, or perhaps prisoners shut up in some loathsome place or criminals who must be confined to keep them from doing harm to other people, how thankful I feel that I can enjoy so much,—that the pure air and blessed sunshine are free to all, even the very poorest in the country, and that those who love beautiful things can always find something beautiful to look at.

I think the birds and bees enjoy these things too, for they get up so early in the morning and seem so very happy. Indeed I am awakened almost every morning by a concert among the birds, and it seems as if they tried to see which would sing the loudest and sweetest;—then Pedro, my canary, wakes up and joins them.

Now, why do you suppose the Lord has made so many beautiful things? Was it merely for his own pleasure, or for our happiness? It was, because he loved us and wished us to be happy, and he is doing all he can to make us love him. Some people have very erroneous views and ideas of God. They think he is a terrible being who hates sinners, and threatens them with dreadful sufferings unless they repent and serve him. This is not true, for although he does not love sin, yet he loves all his creatures and does not delight in the death of any, but rather that they would come to him and be saved. And because he loves people he sent his only Son into the world, that whosoever believeth in him might not perish but live forever. Thus he does all he can to convince people that he is good and loves them for you know that is one reason why they should love him in return. After this whenever you look out on the beautiful earth or sky, let it remind you of the love of God.

This is not all: He has promised to all who love and obey him "a new earth" where they may live forever. That will be far more beautiful than the present one, and there will be nothing there to trouble any one or make them afraid. No one will shed tears, for there will be no occasion to do so, for "sorrow and sighing will flee away." There will be no pain nor dying, nor parting with those we love. The bright flowers will not wither nor the green leaves fade as they do here. The cold winds and snows of winter will not come there nor the scorching heat of summer.

The people will hunger and thirst no more, nor will "the inhabitant ever say, I am sick." And all this because there will be no sin there. You know it was sin, or disobedience to God's law, "that brought death into the world and all our woe," and thus the Lord cursed even the ground for man's sake, but "there will be no more curse" when the earth is made new. When the Lord destroyed the old world with the flood because of sin, he promised Noah that he would never bring a flood of water upon the earth to destroy it again, and he set his bow (the rainbow) in the cloud as a sign, that people might remember the promise. He also said, "While the earth remaineth, seed-time and harvest, and cold and heat, and summer and winter, and day and night shall not cease." The returning seasons also remind us of the promise.

So the Lord knowing that people would sometimes get almost discouraged and begin to doubt if the promise in regard to the new earth would ever be fulfilled, because it was made so long time ago, reminds us of it with every returning spring, when the budding things come forth, and the earth is clothed with her new dress. And when we see the flowers spring up again, that we thought were forever dead, they too remind us of the resurrection, when the dead will live again to die no more.

When the earth was cursed the Lord caused it to bring forth thorns and thistles, and perhaps some of you know what unpleasant things they are. Well, they are a sign that the curse is on the earth. When the earth is made new, "instead of the thorn shall come up the fir tree, and instead of the brier shall come up the myrtle tree, and it shall be to the Lord for a name, for an everlasting sign that shall not be cut off." So says the prophet Isaiah. That will be a sign that the curse is removed. When the earth is thus made new and fair, Aunt Louisa hopes to meet all the young readers of this paper, if not before, when we may praise the Lord for his love and goodness, and talk of all the beautiful things which he hath made.

WORDS BY THE WAY.

I thought I would give a few words that came to me recently. Meeting a Br. one morning, the first salutation was, Good morning Br. S., how are you? where do you attend meeting now? I answered him. He said, Do they preach up that non-resurrection doctrine there now? My answer was, A part of the time it is preached. The coming of the Lord is also preached. Then he asked, Do you believe in non-resurrection of the wicked? I answered, I cannot see who is to give them life: all mankind are in death now. His reply was, It is not true. I asked, will you explain this passage, 2 Cor. v. 14, "If one died for all, then all were dead?" I had no answer from him. I said, would you explain it, Dead in trespasses and sins? I wished him to commit himself here. I asked, Did not our Lord physically die? If that was a fact, then was it not a fact also that all mankind were physically dead? Well, he believed it was down right blasphemy, and the infidel likes. I replied, The Lord was accused of blasphemy, and I will try and bear it. I remarked to him, the same was said many years ago when the doctrine of the destruction of the wicked came up. He repeated the same over again, and left me without the usual "good-by."

The above is a specimen of what we hear frequently, as we meet with those we used to walk together with to the house of God. The inquiry is also raised, Are you not backsliders, that made you take hold of such infidel doctrine? Now all this is like the man in the fable who undertook to make the boy come down off the apple tree by throwing grass at him. Let them look and study candidly Paul's meaning in the above passage; we cannot think he would mislead us in our inquiry. Is it not a fact that Paul gives the idea that all men are dead (so considered in the mind of God) on account of trespasses and sins, already condemned? Then we see the condemned awaiting execution.

What are the facts in the case of Adam? Was he not judicially and virtually dead in the day that he sinned? Physical decay commenced on him, ("dying thou shalt die"); "man dieth and wasteth away, yea man giveth up the ghost and where is he"? Job xiv. 10. Adam Clarke and John Locke hold that "Adam then began to die, by a lingering death of wasting inward decay." We see also this fact in mankind. All the life of Adam was forfeited; he was subject to death under the law of mortality, was an heir of death; that was his inheritance; his award or execution was sure to follow; he was under sentence of death; his posterity are just there. And so Jesus our Lord must have meant when he said, "Let the dead bury the dead." Though Adam lived on many years, still the sentence was on him. There was no reprieve to him nor to his posterity, except they believe on Jesus Christ. Then they pass from death unto life. Their legal condition is shifted, changed; they are exempt from that penalty. They "shall not come into condemnation;" their faith exempts them, justifies. They accepted the amnesty through the mercy of God in Jesus; otherwise how is their legal condition affected? Not at all, "the wrath of God abideth (still) on them." "He that loveth not his brother abideth in death," John iii. 14. This passage showing that the unregenerate believer's condition remains the same as in the beginning. "They will not come unto Him that they may have life." The judge in the great decision day finds them still under sentence. Their federal head Adam was to lose his existence; go back to the dust again. They following him, lose their existence; return back to the dust. "Thou takest away their breath, they die, and return to their dust." "Let the sinners be consumed out of the earth, and let the wicked be no more," Ps. civ. 29, 35. This is most likely about the purport of the decision of the judge, when he shall sit upon his throne. In the case of Adam, by what law would he be judged, supposing he should be raised to life again, as some claim? I do not find any in the record. If returning to dust and coming up to life again, to be examined for guilt or innocence of Adam, was the intention of God at some future time, where is the intimation in the Scriptures? We surely do expect that he comprehended what God had pronounced upon him; he had heard of his origin: Did he mistake the meaning? We are told that he lived 930 years and died, (returned to dust); was this all the penalty that was pronounced upon him? Now, if he died in his sins (without faith) having received all the penalty pronounced, will it be just to disturb his slumbers, and pass on his case again and repeating the same penalty? I think not. Then if Adam comes not again from the grave what becomes of the text so often quoted, John v. 29? If one individual is wanting, (that is, allowing the full meaning that is put upon it,) how stands the text, it cannot have a universal application. I have met with those persons who advanced the idea that Adam would come with the rest of mankind, and answer for sins which he committed in after life, while he was shut out from the garden. I hope never to resort to conjecture for proof on a matter so important, in searching for truth.

METEOROLOGY.

The subject of meteorology is one that should attract more general attention than it does, its laws being comparatively unknown at the present time, and even the most trifling observations, suggestions and experiments made with reference to this important science should be recorded and carefully examined and preserved. We constantly meet with persons of but little general intelligence who can predict almost with certainty some of the approaching changes of wind or weather, by carefully noticing certain indications which are known from their own and the experience of others to be generally correct. Were all the weather philosophy of farmers, sailors, fishermen, hunters, shepherds, stage drivers, and others, collected, it would constitute a volume filled in a great measure with suggestive information; and like the unavailing search after "the philosopher's stone," or fruitless experimenting in the hopes of discovering "perpetual motion," though not resulting in positive success, the very failures and disappointments experienced by the alchemist and the mechanical experimenter have been the means of opening new channels of thought in the minds of others, terminating in the wonderful discoveries of the chemist and the magnificent mechanical contrivances of modern times.

The united historical evidence from the battle-fields and naval engagements of Europe since the commencement of the present century, and of our own battle-field during the rebellion, concur in sustaining the meteorological fact that cannonading affects the atmosphere to such an extent that thunder-storms and heavy rains, or rains alone, almost always accompany or succeed where it has been for many hours heavy and continuous. This war has also demonstrated, what is of more importance to us, that heavy and continuous firing affects the atmosphere not only in its own immediate vicinity, but at hundreds of miles west or north of it, by producing within a few hours sudden, and, in most cases, unseasonable changes of the winds, usually accompanied by cloudy weather or rain without thunder-storms; and in no instance at any season for the last three years has a general engagement been immediately succeeded in this latitude by severe cold weather, the cannonading appearing to have complete control over the currents of air producing cold.

If, then, the cannonading of this war, which was confined to certain lines of latitude and longitude, produced rain in their own vicinity, and at points more or less distant, what effect would cannonading from batteries arranged across the continent on different lines of latitude, and connected by telegraph so as to notify of approaching storms, have on the atmospheric currents? Would batteries, taking St. Paul's as the line of latitude, have dispersed the cold storm of January 1, 1864, thereby preserving from destruction so many valuable animals and fruit trees, or the August frost of 1863, which destroyed half the value of the growing crops of the West? or batteries, taking Chicago as the line of latitude, check the spring frosts that so frequently annihilate our fruit and damage our wheat, after they have escaped all the perils of winter? or at what points should batteries be worked this present season for the purpose of suspending for a short period the rains which are now retarding the planting of the staple crops of the West?

Surrounding the coast of Great Britain there is a system of signals warning mariners of approaching storms, the signal stations being connected by telegraph. If cannonading can disperse those storms, how much more advantageous would it be to the seamen and fishermen than to be compelled to remain in port waiting for the storms to disperse themselves.

These are all points of much interest, and are worthy of being experimented on under the supervision and control of an enlightened and unprejudiced meteorologist. Before the removal of the batteries from the vicinity of Richmond and other points it is the duty of the Government to institute a series of experiments bearing on this subject, which, if conducted systematically and honestly, will certainly, in this latitude, go to sustain the rain theory.

GREAT RAINS OF TH WEST.

All the Western rivers taking their rise in the Rocky Mountains and the great Valley of the Mississippi, and discharging their waters into the Gulf of Mexico through the various mouths and outlets of that river, inundate their banks about every seventh year, or periodically. These inundations overflow large tracts of river bottom and swamp lands in the States of Missouri, Arkansas, Tennessee, Mississippi and Louisiana, covering an extent of surface which, taken in the aggregate, makes a total equal to an inland sea of several hundred miles square. The evaporation from this immense water surface, stimulated by the tropical heat, is carried northward by the prevailing and usual warm south-west winds blowing from Mexico, until, meeting with the regular evaporation of the great Northern lakes, the atmosphere becomes overcharged with vapor, condensation follows, and the result is, that over a large portion of the Valley of the Mississippi, lying north of the mouth of the Ohio, copious and unseasonable rains prevail. This is the periodical year of the overflow; the season is unusually wet, and unseasonable rains may be looked for until the summer heats, acting on the excessive evaporation, rarifies it to such an extent that they check its descent in the form of rain, and all general overflows of the Mississippi and its tributaries are sure to be accompanied with spring and summer seasons remarkable for their wetness.

The Review of Sherman's Army.

The Washington correspondent of the Times says of the review of Sherman's army on the 24th:—

"The men who marched from the Ohio to the Tennessee under Buell, only to march back again; who first penetrated down into Alabama under the daring and nervous Mitchell; who fought at Perrysville under McCook, and checked the advancing tide of the rebellion to again send it reeling southward, at Stone River, under the chivalrous Rosecrans; who toiled over the rugged passes of the Cumberland Mountains, and seized the great natural fortress of Chattanooga; who held the left with a tenacity that saved them from defeat at Chickamauga, under the ever-victorious Thomas; who stormed Lookout Mountain, and fought above the clouds with Hooker; who cut their way from Chattanooga to Atlanta, and from Atlanta to the sea; who swept the Carolinas as with a besom of destruction, and who gave the finishing blow to the great rebellion, in following the lead of Sherman, and Howard, and Slocum—these were the men who received to-day the enthusiastic plaudits of a hundred thousand spectators.

"The interest of to-day has exceeded that of yesterday. The Army of the Potomac is our old acquaintance, but the Armies of Georgia and Tennessee few people here had ever seen. The most eager interest was therefore exhibited to view the veterans of the West, whose marches can only be counted by thousands of miles.

"The magnificent physique of the men at once elicits the admiration of all; tall, erect, broad-shouldered, stalwart men, the peasantry of the West—the best material in the whole world for armies. The brigades move by with elastic, springing step, in excellent order, and fully equal to the marching of yesterday, save that the intervals between brigades and divisions were longer, though the regiments themselves were kept well closed up. At the head of each brigade was a battalion of black pioneers, the simon-pure contraband, in the garments he wore on the plantation, with shovel and ax on the shoulder, marching with even front, sturdy step and lofty air.

"The rear of Gen. Barnum's brigade was brought up by the first genuine pack-mule train ever seen in Washington. I will warrant Barnum had an eye to letting his friends see with what a degree of comfort he travels. It was a most nonchalant, grotesque spectacle—two very diminutive white donkeys bestrode by two diminutive black contrabands. If that is not a paradox, a dozen patient pack-mules, mounted with Mexican pack saddles, camp equipage on one side and boxes of hard tack on the other; half-a-dozen contraband females on foot; a dozen contraband males leading the mules; a white soldier or two on horseback, to see that everything was all right; the servants of the mess, and the mess-kit, and, scattered about on the panniers of the mules, reclining very domestically, half a dozen game cocks, a brace of young coons, and a sure-footed goat, all presenting such a scene as brought laughter and cheers from end to end of the avenue.

"To give an idea of the length of the column, it is only necessary to state that when the rear of the Fourteenth corps passed over Long Bridge the head of the Twentieth had already crossed the river on the pontoon bridge at the foot of Twentieth street, the route being from the first-named bridge along Maryland avenue to the Capitol, around the Capitol on the south side to Third street east, along that northwardly to Maryland avenue, thence westwardly to the Capitol, passing around on the north side to Pennsylvania avenue, up this avenue westwardly by way of Fifteenth street to Twentieth street, and thence south to the river. The entire distance of this column was fully seven miles. These two corps did not embrace more than half the entire force reviewed, which would make the whole column about fifteen miles long. It required a little more than six hours to pass any given point."

The Public Debt of Great Britain.

In the budget recently presented by Mr. Gladstone to the British Parliament it is stated that on March 31, 1859, the total public debt was £825,934,000, and on March 31, 1865, it was £808,288,000—showing a decline of £17,646,000, or at the rate of about three millions of pounds sterling per annum. In 1859 the total amount of the trade with France was £26,431,000, and in 1864, £49,797,000, or nearly ninety per cent increase. The revenue for the financial year of 1864-65 amounted to £70,313,000. The expenditures were £65,957,000—showing a decrease as compared with those of 1860-61, the year of the highest expenditure, of £6,547,000 since the Russian war, but an increase of nearly twelve and a half millions as compared with the ordinary expenditures immediately antecedent to that period. The whole trade of the country, which last year was valued at £445,000,000, had increased during the year ending on the 31st of December, 1864, to £487,000,000, the imports being £274,000,000 and the exports £213,000,000. Those who argue that a preponderance of imports over exports is opposed to the commercial prosperity of a nation receive a practical refutation of their theory in these conclusive figures. The estimated income for the financial year just entered upon is £70,170,000, and the expenditures, £66,139,000.

Grafting Roses.

Grafting roses is not like grafting apples and pears; it is more of an intermediate process between budding and common grafting; the rose-grafters merely take a thicker slice of wood behind the bud than is done in budding—say a thicker and a little longer slice, and one bud only; then the stock needs only a like slice to be cut out of it, and the new bud and slice to be nicely fitted to the part without tongueing or wedging; nothing but to tie on the slice. Supposing you took a slice of bark and wood off a branch, and cut across the bottom to take it out fair, would it not be easy to stick on the same slice again, and tie it round with some soft binding? Of course it would; nothing was ever yet easier to learn in this world.

Rose-grafting is quite as easy, only you take the slice from a different branch, which is all the difference. But clever practitioners do it still easier. They cut off the head of the rose stock, and leave only a little stump out of the pot; from the top of this stump they slice off about $1\frac{1}{2}$ inch down, and make a cut across the bottom of the slice, which leaves a notch there, and on that notch they rest or fit the bottom end of the graft slice, then cut the top end of the slice square with the top of the stock, tie, and clay; sometimes they do not clay at all, but it is usual for ordinary people to put on a little clay for all kinds of grafts.

The best way to clay a rose graft and all pot grafts is, to put a lump of clay in a pot saucer and as much water as will make it into a soft paste, like very thick paint, and with a little brush paint the stock and graft all round, then dust it over with sand, which will keep it from cracking, and all is finished. Gardeners make their own brushes for this work; a bit of soft matting tied on the end of a stick like a pen-holder is all they require. When you hear of people grafting roses in-doors, the plan is still more easy. There is no pot or mold, only so many rose stocks lifted out of the ground on purpose, and any of the ways of grafting will do.—Journal of Horticulture.

Use of Waste Heat in Kilns.

A correspondent of the London Builder, who appears to be a practical man, referring to the gases arising from Portland cement, says that while it is burning in the kilns a great heat is obtained by consuming the gases, and then passing the same under a drying floor. When alight, the gases are like a rolling sea of fire, and this will travel a great distance before it requires a chimney-shaft; that is to say, if the flues are in a straight line, the heat from the gas will dry well for a distance of 120 ft. in length, and 60 ft. in width. The kilns he speaks of hold, when burnt, 150 casks. There is a greater improvement, however, which, our correspondent suggests, could be made; first, to let the heat work another set of flues while the men are taking off the stuff, and as soon as they have it off they could shut off another bay; or they might shut off nineteen flues out of twenty, and let the heat work up the one, which would be much better for men working on these hot flues. Secondly, by having a coke oven beside the furnace the gas from this would pass through the coke fire, and the coke from the oven would supply the furnace and much more heat. This plan of furnace would consume but a small quantity of coke, and could be applied to any kind of works for drying, and for material of any description, and if properly constructed would, he thinks, be preferable to any other.

Concrete Buildings.

A correspondent of the Country Gentleman says:—I find that cobblestone packed in lime mortar between boards laid on the wall raised as fast as it sets, makes a cheap and substantial building. It is rough coated on the outside, blocked off and colored in imitation of stone. No finish can excel this in beauty or durability. In the country such finish blends harmoniously with the landscape, is pleasing to the cultivated eye, and winning to the senses. I built an ash and smoke-house 8 feet square by 7 feet high, cemented at bottom, and beautifully finished, for $12. It answers every purpose for such a building, I built a boiler and hog-house, 18 feet square by 12 feet high, well finished on outside, at an expense of $50. I can keep corn in it clear of rats. I built a drying house for a keg-manufacturing company, 18 by 22 feet, by 10 feet high, at a cost of $100. It has sustained a great heat, enough to fire a wooden building, and answers every purpose. Apples could be dried in such a house to good profit. The stones were gathered from the adjacent grounds, and were of all sizes to fit in a 10 and 20-inch wall. Farm hands can work on such walls, having a master mason to direct the laborer. Where stone are plenty, buildings of this material can be reared for one-half the cost of wood. For dwelling houses strips of boards are laid up in the wall for lathing, to give an air chamber to avoid any dampness.

The Oil Regions.

A disgusted newspaper correspondent in the oil regions writes to a Cincinnati paper from Oil City:—"It is really astonishing to what indignities the people who are hunting oil will submit. The hotels are crowded and dirty. The street is one sea of diluted mud, which the struggling horses splash and splatter all over the houses and people. It is worth the price of a good suit of clothes to promenade Main street in Oil City for two days. But oil seekers do more than this. They go on foot up the creek to the 'oil diggings,' over such roads as they never before walked on. And here, too, they are subjected to the same splashing process that prevails on the streets of the city. The road is but a continuation of the streets in all respects, and the pedestrian finds every tired horse or mule on the way just in the act of stumbling over some hidden rock, at the critical moment when his blundering foot can scatter most of the diluted mud. The result of this state of things is apparent. Thousands who come to see are satisfied—no, disgusted—with the first night, and rush away by the morning train. It requires the impetus of a sure prospect of gain to induce one to remain more than a day, while only those who are making a 'pile' will consent to live here."

Subsidence of the Earth's Crust.

The commune of Buonanotte, in France, is hourly menaced with utter destruction. Five manufactories have already been overthrown, and sixty-four more are threatened with imminent ruin. The inhabitants have fled in the greatest consternation to the neighboring villages. The cause of the disaster is a sudden and violent depression of the soil, which is at the present time accounted for by one of two reasons—either the fall of an immense mass of earth in the west of the district, or the yielding of the roof of an extensive subterranean cavern. But in reality nothing certain is yet known as to the cause of this most deplorable event. A number of civil engineers have hastened to the spot, and prompt measures are in course of adoption to prevent still greater disaster.

Rate of Emigration.

The whole number of immigrants who arrived at New York City in the first three days of the week ending the 20th of May, was 4,681. Two steamers arrived subsequently, swelling the total to about 6,000. Another ship was expected, and possibly a steamer, which may bring the figures to 7,000. This is at the rate of 28,000 per month, or 336,000 per annum, at a single port, when the season for large arrivals has not commenced. That begins in June, and usually continues to October and November. We have not seen a report of the arrivals at other places; but every European steamer brings fresh intelligence of the swelling exodus on its way hither, comprehending every nation from the Caspian to the North Sea—every occupation, and that physical ability we can measure from experience.

Benzoin as an Insecticide.

As our houses and gardens are always more or less infested with vermin, it is satisfactory to know that benzoin, an article well-known as a detergent, is efficacious as an insecticide. Two drops are sufficient to suffocate the most redoubtable pest, be it beetle, cockchafer, spider, slug, caterpillar, or other creeping thing. Even rats and mice decamp from any place sprinkled with a few drops of benzoin. A singular fact connected with this application of benzoin is, that the bodies of the insects killed by it become so rigid that their wings, legs, etc., will break rather than bend, if touched. Next day, however, when the benzoin has evaporated, suppleness is restored.—Boston Cultivator.

MISCELLANEOUS SUMMARY.

THE TUNNEL RAILROAD.—Gov. Fenton has vetoed the recent act of the Legislature authorizing a company to construct an underground railroad in this city. He objects to it on the ground that no limit is assigned in which such road is to be completed; and furthermore, that the bill authorizes the transfer of State and city property for the use of the company.

A TOAD lately found by some quarrymen at Hartlepool, Eng., and announced to be 6000 years old, is declared not a myth. The Rev. Robert Taylor, of St. Hilda's Parsonage, states that the toad is still alive, that it has no mouth, that it was found in the center of a block of magnesian limestone, 25 feet below the surface of the earth, and that it differs in many respects from all ordinary toads.

ACCORDING to Dr. James Johnston, 800,000,000 of men smoke different sorts of tobacco; 400,000 smoke opium and its compounds; 300,000 hemp and haschish; 100,000 betel, and 40,000 the American plant coca.

IN the dwelling houses lighted by gas, the frequent renewal of the air is of great importance. A single gas-burner will consume more oxygen, and produce more carbonic acid to deteriorate the atmosphere of a room, than six or eight candles.

DUTCH GAP CANAL NAVIGABLE.—The Dutch Gap Canal, it seems, has not been altogether a failure, for the Richmond Whig says that General Mulford arrived there from Fortress Monroe, having passed through Butler's Dutch Gap Canal on the steamer Clyde. This is the first steamer that has passed through.

EVIDENCES OF IMMORTALITY.---No. 1.

Br. Storrs:—The opening of your paper to the discussion of this question is an evidence of more liberality and desire for truth than is generally manifested by Editors of religious journals. A one-sided discussion seems to be the policy of all sectarian bodies, and well it may be, for the scrutinizing pen of free investigation would instantly exhibit to the gaze of an astonished world, popular doctrines the most foolish, and in effect the most pernicious.

In discussing this question, as well as all others of great importance, it is necessary that we have a standard authority. I trust that you and I will have no dispute about authority. The Bible is the standard of measurement for all doctrines and theories. Whatever it says we are bound to believe; and whatever it fails to say we have no right to add. It is to be received as containing all that is necessary to be known of the future world, and man's condition when he shall have departed this life.

I, of course, shall affirm man's immortality without regard to moral character, and I will base my arguments upon Bible authority. Nature, although voluminous in evidence, will receive but a passing notice. In receiving the testimony of revelation upon this all important question, we are to understand its language as we would understand the language of any other book, without any mysteri ous or incomprehensible meaning, and of course, will spend no time in bandying words about what the original may say or mean. It is with the present translation; the Bible as it is that we have to deal. If we cannot receive the Bible as unquestioned authority without a new translation, then it follows that the great mass of mankind have no Bible, and the untold millions that have stepped from the stage of being have fallen in heathen darkness.

The first question that should be asked in the discussion of man's immortality is, what is man? The Bible and Nature like a faithful witness is ready with the answer that man is a compound. Matt. x. 28, "Fear him which is able to destroy both soul and body in hell." If man did not possess a soul and body, each distinct from the other then the above language would not be admissible. "Soul and body" means two things, and those two belong to the individual man, and yet not depending upon each other for life. The text plainly declares that the body may be killed and the soul still live. Matt xvi. 26, "For what is a man profited if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul." Here the soul seems to be a thing possessed, which implies a possessor. Luke xii. 20, "Thou fool, this night thy soul shall be required of thee." This text declares that the soul shall be separated from the rest of man. It is required of the man. Hebrews iv. 12, "For the word of God is quick and powerful, and sharper than any two edged sword, piercing even to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit and of the joints and marrow, and is a discerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart." The text first quoted divides soul and body, this divides soul and spirit. Thess. v. 23, "And I pray God your whole spirit, and soul, and body be preserved blameless." This needs no comment. The language is plain, and I presume will not be contradicted. Man, then is a trinity, and these three ingredients are not dependent upon each other for existence. One may be dead and the balance alive.

I come now to the fall of man, a very important point in this investigation. Adam, we are informed in the Bible, was created holy and upright, and in the grandeur of his purity, with a full knowledge of the consequence of disobedience to God's commands was placed on trial. He chose the ways of sin, and the consequences which God had promised fell upon him, Gen. ii. 17, "In the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die." This was the penalty attached to the crime. Death, nothing more, nothing less. We are to understand here that God meant just what he said, and that he executed his promise. If Adam did not die at the time promised, but lived several hundred years afterwards, then, the inquiry is what did befall him at that time? He certainly met with a change visible, and terrible in its effects. So great was the change that Adam hid himself from the presence of the Lord. We are not informed in scripture that Adam lived the balance of his days on trial, but the experiment whether he would sin was completed when he partook of the fruit denied him. Then comes the penalty. Not a word is said about postponing the execution. But God continues to talk with Adam as a fallen creature, telling him the consequences that would follow the additional curse placed upon the ground. The cursing of the serpent, ground, &c., was no small consideration in addition to the plagues of a fallen race. These plagues rested upon Adam not as a penalty of disobedience, but as a consequence of his fallen state. To view them as the consequence of disobedience would clearly charge God with adding penalties after the crime was committed. This would hang a vail between man and the consequences of sin, and therefore, make the future a dark and mystical uncertainty. God makes no such mistakes. And if he had intended to punish Adam with more than death he would certainly have told him so. God is silent about this after punishment until the crime is committed. To presume that this is God's dealings with the human race is to presume that He may change the law and his promises concerning us, Therefore the uncertainty of God's word.

Death, then, being the penalty, and God executing the law in the day that is declared, how did Adam die? I answer he died a spiritual death. That spirit that dwelt with him in his angelic purity took its departure to the God who gave it, and in its room we find the spirit of the evil one a prominent characteristic of the human race. The death resting upon the human race as the penalty of sin has no reference to decay, loss of consciousness, identity, &c. It is not so represented in the Bible. Romans v. 12 we find that death is the natural condition of the human race, and out of Christ there is no resurrection from that death. It does not appear anywhere in the Bible that death such as the animal experiences, and which seems to be the natural lot of all living creatures, was in consequence of sin. "For the son of man came to save that which was lost," Matt. xviii. 11. To restore to the human race what was lost in Adam seems be the mission of Christ, and if a natural death is the consequence of Adam's transgression then they that are in Christ will never die. It will be a sad thought to confess that Enoch and Elijah were the only examples of the human race fit for heaven.

It is upon this point that we are to decide the issue. If natural death is the consequence of sin, and there is but one death, then it is clear that the wicked dead will be no more. But, on the other hand, should we find in this investigation that there are two deaths, one the consequence of violated law, the other the natural offspring of Divine Nature and a birth to a new world, we can clearly understand how the wicked dead will have a conscious existence after they have passed the rudimental sphere. If it can be shown that death and annihilation are synonymous terms, and that they are so understood in the Bible, then my position is unfounded, and I, as an honest man will confess my error. It is true that annihilation would be death, but I contend that death is not always annihilation. It was not in the case of Adam. Annihilation has not been the lot of any. Death, in the Bible has various meanings, but I do not remember that it is synonymous with annihilation anywhere.

Truly yours in Christ.

E. B. Louden, M. D.

Response to the Foregoing.

Our friend's opening remark is received as evidence of his appreciation of our principle of free discussion. This is not a new thing with us. For more than twenty years the advocates of Immortality only in Christ have been just as free. They have always evinced a readiness to hear all the arguments that may be brought against them. No "religious journal" on our side of the question has ever acted otherwise; so that our friend's just remark only rebukes the "religious journals" of his own belief. He cannot find a single periodical of his own denomination that dares to discuss this question. Whatever "the scrutinizing pen of free investigation exhibits" on this head is thus far without official "Methodistic" permission.

We agree with our friend concerning the "standard authority." We also hold with him that "we are to understand its language as we would understand the language of any other book."

We dissent from the remarks in disparagement of appeals to the "original." Our common translation is in the main an excellent one, but in many cases it is palpably erroneous.

Our friend says: "I shall affirm man's immortality without regard to moral character, and will base my arguments upon Bible authority. Nature, although voluminous in evidence, will receive but a passing notice." We, on the contrary, shall deny man's natural immortality, and shall rigidly hold our friend to the issue as stated by himself.

The first text quoted by the affirmative is Matt. x. 28. "Fear not them who kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul: but rather fear him who is able to destroy both soul and body in hell." Our friend concludes from this text "that the body may be killed and the soul still live;" but he entirely overlooks the equally plain declaration that the soul may be destroyed as well as the body. What help then does he get here? If a thing may be destroyed it is not immortal.

The next text is Matt. xvi. 26, "For what is a man profited if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul?" The phrase "his own soul" is evidently a Hebraism for "himself." The parallel passage, Luke xi. 25, reads thus: "For what is a man advantaged if he gain the whole world, and lose himself." The original in Luke is yet more emphatic: "And destroy or lose himself." We cannot see any implication of immortality here. Luke xii. 20 is susceptible of the same construction. Before leaving these passages we deem it proper to say that the word "soul," to which so much importance is attached, comes from the Greek psuchee, and is very often rendered "life." The affirmative should take notice of this in the text directly preceeding his quoted, Matt. xvi. 26. Verse 25 reads, "For whosoever will save his life shall lose it: and whosoever will lose his life for my sake shall find it." Our translators saw that it would be improper to translate thus: "Whosoever will save his soul shall lose it: and whosoever will lose his soul for my sake shall find it." But the word might have the uniform reading–"life"–in both texts; for the 26th verse would make very good sense if we should read: "For what is a man profited, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own life? or what shall he give in exchange for his life?" Our friend, being a Methodist, may appreciate Adam Clarke's remark on the word psuchee here. "Sure I am, it means life in both verses." See his commentary. In view, however, of the parallel passage in Luke we think the common version is correct. At any rate, it brings out the principle that psuchee may be rendered either way. We prefer Robinson's rending of Luke xii. 20 to the common one, as more suitable to the idea intended to be conveyed. "This night thy life shall be required of thee." See his Lexicon.

Heb. iv. 12 and 1 Thess. v. 23 do not need any comment, for they say nothing of immortality.

It is said that "Adam was created holy." This we deny until evidence is given.

It is said that the consequence of Adam's transgression was "a spiritual death." What kind of a death is that? Until we are fur nished with Bible evidence of such a death, we deny it. The only explanation of the phrase given as yet, is this: "That spirit that dwelt with him in his angelic purity took its departure to the God who gave it, and in its room we find the spirit of the evil one." We deny that man was angelic. We deny that any spirit went to God. By the way, there appears to be a contradiction here. One spirit is said to go away and another comes "in its room." Where, then, is the "spiritual death." There is just as much "spirit" after the "death" as before

It is said that "the death resting upon the human race as a penalty for sin has no reference to decay, loss of consciousness, identity, &c. It is not so represented in the Bible." Now if there is anything "represented in the Bible" it is this very thing which our friend denies. He refers to Rom. v. 12. Let us quote it. "By one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned." Here is a clear reference to the garden of Eden. The "one man" was Adam; the sin was the eating of the forbidden fruit; the penalty of transgression was "death." What is death? We appeal to Worcester for the primary meaning: "Extinction of life; entire loss of vitality; that state of an organized being in which all its natural functions have ceased to act." Now this literal definition of death must stand unless cause can be shown to the contrary by the affirmative. Moreover, the same Apostle has established the fact that the death is "such as the animal experiences." He says in 1 Cor. xv. 21, "By man came death." What man? The next verse shows. "In Adam all die." The same death that is spoken of in Rom. v. 12. That it is literal death is settled by the context, "By man came death, by man came also the resurrection of the dead." Our friend will not deny the literality of the resurrection. But if the resurrection is literal, then the death is literal. Again: "As in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive." Our friend will not deny that the making alive is a quickening of those who are literally dead. But the death from which they are brought to life comes on them "in Adam." The short conclusion is,—If the death in 1 Cor. xv. 21, 22 is literal, then the death in Rom. v. 12 is literal; and if the latter is literal, then the threatened death in Eden was literal. As this death certainly "has reference to decay, loss of consciousness, identity, &c.," therefore the affirmative may safely desert his baseless theory of "spiritual death." Let him remember that "the Bible is the standard .... whatever it says we are bound to believe, and whatever it fails to say we have no right to add." It "says" death; it "fails to say" "spiritual death." And again: "The penalty was death; nothing more, nothing less. We are to understand here that God meant just what he said."

The difficulty in our friend's mind with reference to the import of "death" is indicated by his remark that "Adam did not die at the time promised, but lived several hundred years afterward." Our friend seeks to get rid of this obstacle by inventing a theory of "spiritual death" which runs counter to the whole Bible. It is better to leave a problem unsolved than to deny the first principles of revealed truth. The whole matter is clear to us. "The Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and man became"—just what every fish of the sea, every fowl of the air, every beast of the field, and every creeping thing was before man was made—"a living soul." "The first man was of the earth, earthy"—consequently a corruptible being. He was just as much a subject of dissolution, decay, and corruption as any other animal. The creature was made subject to vanity by reason of Him who subjected it, with a hope that through a wise choice and a proper development man would be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the liberty of the glory of a son of God. "For whom God did foreknow he also did predestinate to be conformed to the image of his Son, that he might be the first born among many brethren." Rom. viii.

God determined to put Adam on trial for immortality. For this purpose of trial "the Lord God planted a garden eastward in Eden .....And out of the ground made the Lord God to grow every tree....the tree of life also in the midst of the garden, and the tree of knowledge of good and evil." This was the place of trial. After it was prepared, "the Lord took Adam and put him into the garden of Eden," as a probationer for immortality. The tree of life was adapted to counteract the natural law of dissolution in Adam, and so long as he could partake of that tree he could not die. Here he was, then, a mortal man in an immortal residence, so to speak. The law of Eden was set forth, "Of every tree of the garden thou mayest freely eat: but of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, thou shalt not eat of it: for in the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die." Adam broke the commandment, ate of the forbidden fruit. The penalty was death. How should it be executed? It could not be visited in the garden, for there was the tree of life to prevent. Adam could not die in the garden. But the sentence had been declared. And the deed had been committed. Mark the fulfillment of the penalty. "And the Lord God said, Behold, the man"—has transgressed my law, has eaten of the forbidden fruit, and—"is become one of us, to know good and evil"—my sentence must be executed—"and now lest he put forth his hand, and take nevertheless"—notwithstanding my sentence—"of the tree of life, and eat, and live forever [continue his existence by means of the tree of life]; therefore"—to carry out the sentence—"the Lord sent him forth from the garden of Eden....and he placed at the east of the garden of Eden, cherubim, and a flaming sword which turned every way, to keep the way to the tree of life." Thus God did execute his sentence that very day: for Adam being expelled from the great death-preventive, became in that day subject to the law of corruption in his nature. Death was inevitable. Thus that death which was in one sense a consequence of natural law, was in another sense a consequence of disobedience—a penalty of sin. As Adam represented the entire race in his sin, the same natural death became a universal penalty. "By one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned." Says Dr. Chalmers: "Here is a common ground on which the certainties of divine revelation meet, and are at one with the certainties of human experience.... It is indeed a striking accordancy, that what in one view of it appears to be a uniform process of Nature, in another view of it, is but the unrelenting execution of a dread utterance from the God of Nature."

Our friend says that "the mission of Christ seems to be to restore to the human race what was lost in Adam." This we deny. If we are justified in the denial, we have no need to notice the inference that "if a natural death is the consequence of Adam's transgression then they that are in Christ will never die." Matt. xviii. 11 is quoted. "For the Son of man is come to save that which is lost." But not "what was lost in Adam." Keep to the Bible, and all will be well. The context shows the Saviour is speaking of lost men, who are to be "saved" from perishing in their own corruption.

QUESTIONS ABOUT THE BIBLE.

Will you tell me through "the Herald of Life"

1st. When and where the different books of the Bible were collected together and declared to be the Bible?

2d. Where is the proof that the different books of the Bible were written about the time that it is claimed they were written?

A. G. Hudson.

Response by J. T. C.

The foregoing has been on hand for some time. A proper answer would take up too much room in our columns. The information is furnished in standard works which are easily accessible. Smith's new Dictionary of the Bible is the best. We will say, however, that the answer to the questions may be obtained by any student of the English Bible; for the evidence as far as it goes, is internal—drawn from the books themselves. For instance, the contributor of the article on the Pentateuch in Smith's Dictionary goes into a lengthy discussion of its authorship, and then gives the results of his inquiry, which is valuable as his opinion, and no further. Another man might make the same inquiry, and come to a different conclusion. Our questioner may study the Bible for himself and be satisfied. We believe that the Scriptures, as we have them, have been more or less corrupted, largely through ignorance on the part of ancient transcribers. In some cases there have doubtless been deliberate additions, subtractions and alterations. Our only remedy is a rigid comparison of Scripture with Scripture, and spiritual things with spiritual.

No superficial reader of the Bible can be sure of his conclusions. The Bible was written for those who search it with the aid of reason and the Holy Spirit. Some remarks of Archbishop Whately are applicable here. He is discussing the question of the presumptive value of a supposed divine creed or system of doctrines, the effect of which he claims would be pernicious. His arguments appear to us equally forcible against a perfect Bible, which many seem to think must exist, or there is no basis for our faith.

"But besides the reason we have now been speaking of, there is another, perhaps not less important, against the providing in Scripture of a regular systematic statement of christian doctrines. Supposing such a summary of Gospel truths had been drawn up, and could have been contrived with such exquisite skill as to be sufficient and well adapted for all, of every Age and Country, what would have been the probable result? It would have commanded the unhesitating assent of all Christians; who would with deep veneration, have stored up the very words of it in their memory, without any need of laboriously searching the rest of the Scriptures, to ascertain its agreement with them; which is what we do (at least are evidently called on to do) with a human exposition of the faith: and the absence of this labor, together with the tranquil security as to the correctness of their belief which would have been thus generated, would have ended in a careless and contented apathy. There would have been no room for doubt,—no call for vigilant attention in the investigation of truth,—none of that effort of mind which is now requisite, in comparing one passage with another, and collecting instruction from the scattered, oblique, and incidental references to various doctrines in the existing Scriptures; and in consequence none of that excitement of the best feelings, and that improvement of the heart, which are the natural, and doubtless the designed result of an humble, diligent, and sincere study of the christian Scriptures.

"In fact, all study, properly so called, of the rest of Scripture,—all lively interest in its perusal,—would have been nearly superseded by such an inspired compendium of doctrine; to which alone, as far the most convenient for that purpose, habitual reference would have been made in any questions that might arise. Both would have been regarded, indeed, as of divine authority; but the compendium, as the fused and purified metal: the other, as the mine containing the crude ore. And the Compendium itself, being not like the existing Scriptures, that from which the faith is to be learned, but the very thing to be learned, would have come to be regarded by most with an indolent, unthinking veneration, which would have exercised little or no influence on the character.

"Their orthodoxy would have been, as it were, petrified, like the bodies of those animals we read of incrusted in the ice of the polar regions; firm-fixed, indeed, and preserved unchangeable, but cold, motionless, lifeless.

"It is only when our energies are roused, and our faculties exercised, and our attention kept awake, by an ardent pursuit of truth, and anxious watchfulness against error,—when, in short, we feel ourselves to be doing something towards acquiring or retaining, or improving our knowledge,—it is then only, that knowledge makes the requisite practical impression on the heart and on the conduct."

SOUTHERN PRISONS.

I think we ought all to take shame to ourselves, almost, that we have eaten and drunken, that we have lain down and risen up, and gone about our business and our pleasure, while our soldiers—the heroes and patriots whose breasts have made a living wall of defence betwixt us and our foes, were starving to death in the prisons of the South.

For a long time I thought what you probably did, reader, that the stories could not be true—they must be exaggerated, that it was not in the heart of a man to treat his brother as we were told that Southern soldiers treated Northern ones. Fiends might do these things; but men were not devils, and anything that fell below these could not practice the systematic, sickening barbarities which we read and heard that our own countrymen perpetrated on each other. But at last the evidence accumulated from sources that rendered the facts indisputable as the sun at noonday, and we knew that men—our own countrymen, in this nineteenth century, were being absolutely frozen, tortured, starved to death!

While I write this, it still seems incredible, but the awful horrors of Libby Prison, of Andersonville, of Sailsbury, are facts! One seized at any shadow of apologies for such cruelties; and when we heard that the South fed her prisoners as well as she did her armies, we hoped that this might in some degree, extenuate their treatment of our men. But Sherman's path through the fruitful fields of Georgia and the Carolinas, has settled all doubts on that head; neither before God or men has the South the faintest shadow of an excuse for dooming her prisoners of war to a slow death of freezing, starvation, cruelty. Read of them unclothed, unfed, haggard, staggering in dirt, in distress, reduced to idiocy, and longing for death. Oh, brothers, whose sufferings have wrought our deliverance, and made our country the proud, free, nation she is this day, my heart grows sick remembering how you suffered and died, and thinking of the low dark graves where you lie to-day, buried as good men would scorn to bury dogs and horses, with brutual jest, and sneer, and exultation. Who shall tell the story of your sorrows—who shall sing the song of your silent heroism! We your debtors can never do it. You bought for us the victory, and the peace which we enjoy to-day, and to you, under God, be the honor and the glory! We all know that magnanimity and generosity become conquerors—that courtesy and clemency are the part of victors towards the vanquished, and that the first duty of a Christian nation is to set an example of forbearance and forgivness.

But because of this shall we open the doors of our prisons? Shall we smile upon and take to our confidence highwaymen and murderers? Shall the men who rattled into Lawrence with the early dawn and slayed her helpless fathers, and sons, and brothers—shall the men who could see day by day the famishing eyes, the pinched faces, the skeleton forms of our starving men—shall they go unrebuked and unpunished?

At least let the names of those who had charge of these prisons, and who committed these appalling cruelties, be given to the world, and to the undying infamy which they deserve! Why, the names of Benedict Arnold and Aaron Burr grow luminous beside them.

I have heard Northern people say that Jefferson Davis was not "at the core a bad-hearted man." Did he know that in his own dominions stood, with their burdens of sin and suffering, these prison walls of agony crying unto God? Was it by his consent and authority that these things were?

I have known Northern men and women to praise General Robert E. Lee for a "courteous and kind-hearted gentleman." Did he ever, by word of his mouth or stroke of his pen, oppose or alleviate the sufferings that for all these years have been going on under his eyes? Where were the wives of these men that they did not with tears and supplications give their husbands no rest until they prevailed upon them to relieve the awful miseries that were going on by day and by night among their "prisoners of war?"

Is it not woman's place and duty to be pitiful and sympathetic when man is full of vengence and cruelty? Take the vilest crowd of criminals that were ever herded together beneath one prison roof, and tell to a woman throughout the whole North the half of such a story of horror as we have been told of husbands, and sons, and brothers, and if that woman would not risk her own life to carry food, clothing, medicines, to those men, she would be unworthy her name or her sex.

Dear reader, for the ignorant, misguided deluded South I think we ought to have little but sympathy and pity. Let us win them, by kindness and forbearance back to a new and better allegiance, and love to the Union. The thing that stood betwixt us, that awful power of darkness, even Slavery has passed away forever, and our future, our prosperity, our honor, is theirs also.

But does not a voice come up to us from the crowds of Southern graves where lie our heroic dead, crying, not for that vengence "which is mine, saith the Lord," but demanding at least for truth and justice's sake that the names of the men who commanded and allowed, and those who executed these demoniac atrocities, shall be given to universal execration and infamy? And if they be men of culture and position, the greater be the horror which their work shall bring down on their own heads; and whether in high places or low, wherever and whatsoever they are, they deserve the wrath and execration of every honest soul throughout the earth. EVIDENCES OF IMMORTALITY.—No. 1.

Br. Storrs:—The opening of your paper to the discussion of this question is an evidence of more liberality and desire for truth than is generally manifested by Editors of religious journals. A one-sided discussion seems to be the policy of all sectarian bodies, and well it may be, for the scrutinizing pen of free investigation would instantly exhibit to the gaze of an astonished world, popular doctrines the most foolish, and in effect the most pernicious.

In discussing this question, as well as all others of great importance, it is necessary that we have a standard authority. I trust that you and I will have no dispute about authority. The Bible is the standard of measurement for all doctrines and theories. Whatever it says we are bound to believe; and whatever it fails to say we have no right to add. It is to be received as containing all that is necessary to be known of the future world, and man's condition when he shall have departed this life.

I, of course, shall affirm man's immortality without regard to moral character, and I will base my arguments upon Bible authority. Nature, although voluminous in evidence, will receive but a passing notice. In receiving the testimony of revelation upon this all important question, we are to understand its language as we would understand the language of any other book, without any mysterious or incomprehensible meaning, and of course, will spend no time in bandying words about what the original may say or mean. It is with the present translation; the Bible as it is that we have to deal. If we cannot receive the Bible as unquestioned authority without a new translation, then it follows that the great mass of mankind have no Bible, and the untold millions that have stepped from the stage of being have fallen in heathen darkness.

The first question that should be asked in the discussion of man's immortality is, what is man? The Bible and Nature like a faithful witness is ready with the answer that man is a compound. Matt. x. 28, "Fear him which is able to destroy both soul and body in hell." If man did not possess a soul and body, each distinct from the other then the above language would not be admissible. "Soul and body" means two things, and those two belong to the individual man, and yet not depending upon each other for life. The text plainly declares that the body may be killed and the soul still live. Matt xvi. 26, "For what is a man profited if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul." Here the soul seems to be a thing possessed, which implies a possessor. Luke xii. 20, "Thou fool, this night thy soul shall be required of thee." This text declares that the soul shall be separated from the rest of man. It is required of the man. Hebrews iv. 12, "For the word of God is quick and powerful, and sharper than any two edged sword, piercing even to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit and of the joints and marrow, and is a discerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart." The text first quoted divides soul and body, this divides soul and spirit. Thess. v. 23, "And I pray God your whole spirit, and soul, and body be preserved blameless." This needs no comment. The language is plain, and I presume will not be contradicted. Man, then is a trinity, and these three ingredients are not dependent upon each other for existence. One may be dead and the balance alive.

I come now to the fall of man, a very important point in this investigation. Adam, we are informed in the Bible, was created holy and upright, and in the grandeur of his purity, with a full knowledge of the consequence of disobedience to God's commands was placed on trial. He chose the ways of sin, and the consequences which God had promised fell upon him, Gen. ii. 17, "In the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die." This was the penalty attached to the crime. Death, nothing more, nothing less. We are to understand here that God meant just what he said, and that he executed his promise. If Adam did not die at the time promised, but lived several hundred years afterwards, then, the inquiry is what did befall him at that time? He certainly met with a change visible, and terrible in its effects. So great was the change that Adam hid himself from the presence of the Lord. We are not informed in scripture that Adam lived the balance of his days on trial, but the experiment whether he would sin was completed when he partook of the fruit denied him. Then comes the penalty. Not a word is said about postponing the execution. But God continues to talk with Adam as a fallen creature, telling him the consequences that would follow the additional curse placed upon the ground. The cursing of the serpent, ground, &c., was no small consideration in addition to the plagues of a fallen race. These plagues rested upon Adam not as a penalty of disobedience, but as a consequence of his fallen state. To view them as the consequence of disobedience would clearly charge God with adding penalties after the crime was committed. This would hang a vail between man and the consequences of sin, and therefore, make the future a dark and mystical uncertainty. God makes no such mistakes. And if he had intended to punish Adam with more than death he would certainly have told him so. God is silent about this after punishment until the crime is committed. To presume that this is God's dealings with the human race is to presume that He may change the law and his promises concerning us, Therefore the uncertainty of God's word.

Death, then, being the penalty, and God executing the law in the day that is declared, how did Adam die? I answer he died a spiritual death. That spirit that dwelt with him in his angelic purity took its departure to the God who gave it, and in its room we find the spirit of the evil one a prominent characteristic of the human race. The death resting upon the human race as the penalty of sin has no reference to decay, loss of consciousness, identity, &c. It is not so represented in the Bible. Romans v. 12 we find that death is the natural condition of the human race, and out of Christ there is no resurrection from that death. It does not appear anywhere in the Bible that death such as the animal experiences, and which seems to be the natural lot of all living creatures, was in consequence of sin. "For the son of man came to save that which was lost," Matt. xviii. 11. To restore to the human race what was lost in Adam seems be the mission of Christ, and if a natural death is the consequence of Adam's transgression then they that are in Christ will never die. It will be a sad thought to confess that Enoch and Elijah were the only examples of the human race fit for heaven.

It is upon this point that we are to decide the issue. If natural death is the consequence of sin, and there is but one death, then it is clear that the wicked dead will be no more. But, on the other hand, should we find in this investigation that there are two deaths, one the consequence of violated law, the other the natural offspring of Divine Nature and a birth to a new world, we can clearly understand how the wicked dead will have a conscious existence after they have passed the rudimental sphere. If it can be shown that death and annihilation are synonymous terms, and that they are so understood in the Bible, then my position is unfounded, and I, as an honest man will confess my error. It is true that annihilation would be death, but I contend that death is not always annihilation. It was not in the case of Adam. Annihilation has not been the lot of any. Death, in the Bible has various meanings, but I do not remember that it is synonymous with annihilation anywhere.

Truly yours in Christ.

Response to the Foregoing.

Our friend's opening remark is received as evidence of his appreciation of our principle of free discussion. This is not a new thing with us. For more than twenty years the advocates of Immortality only in Christ have been just as free. They have always evinced a readiness to hear all the arguments that may be brought against them. No "religious journal" on our side of the question has ever acted otherwise; so that our friend's just remark only rebukes the "religious journals" of his own belief. He cannot find a single periodical of his own denomination that dares to discuss this question. Whatever "the scrutinizing pen of free investigation exhibits" on this head is thus far without official "Methodistic" permission.

We agree with our friend concerning the "standard authority." We also hold with him that "we are to understand its language as we would understand the language of any other book."

We dissent from the remarks in disparagement of appeals to the "original." Our common translation is in the main an excellent one, but in many cases it is palpably erroneous.

Our friend says: "I shall affirm man's immortality without regard to moral character, and will base my arguments upon Bible authority. Nature, although voluminous in evidence, will receive but a passing notice." We, on the contrary, shall deny man's natural immortality, and shall rigidly hold our friend to the issue as stated by himself.

The first text quoted by the affirmative is Matt. x. 28. "Fear not them who kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul: but rather fear him who is able to destroy both soul and body in hell." Our friend concludes from this text "that the body may be killed and the soul still live;" but he entirely overlooks the equally plain declaration that the soul may be destroyed as well as the body. What help then does he get here? If a thing may be destroyed it is not immortal.

The next text is Matt. xvi. 26, "For what is a man profited if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul?" The phrase "his own soul" is evidently a Hebraism for "himself." The parallel passage, Luke xi. 25, reads thus: "For what is a man advantaged if he gain the whole world, and lose himself." The original in Luke is yet more emphatic: "And destroy or lose himself." We cannot see any implication of immortality here. Luke xii. 20 is susceptible of the same construction. Before leaving these passages we deem it proper to say that the word "soul," to which so much importance is attached, comes from the Greek psuchee, and is very often rendered "life." The affirmative should take notice of this in the text directly preceeding his quoted, Matt. xvi. 26. Verse 25 reads, "For whosoever will save his life shall lose it: and whosoever will lose his life for my sake shall find it." Our translators saw that it would be improper to translate thus: "Whosoever will save his soul shall lose it: and whosoever will lose his soul for my sake shall find it." But the word might have the uniform reading—"life"—in both texts; for the 26th verse would make very good sense if we should read: "For what is a man profited, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own life? or what shall he give in exchange for his life?" Our friend, being a Methodist, may appreciate Adam Clarke's remark on the word psuchee here. "Sure I am, it means life in both verses." See his commentary. In view, however, of the parallel passage in Luke we think the common version is correct. At any rate, it brings out the principle that psuchee may be rendered either way. We prefer Robinson's reading of Luke xii. 20 to the common one, as more suitable to the idea intended to be conveyed. "This night thy life shall be required of thee." See his Lexicon.

Heb. iv. 12 and 1 Thess. v. 23 do not need any comment, for they say nothing of immortality.

It is said that "Adam was created holy." This we deny until evidence is given.

It is said that the consequence of Adam's transgression was "a spiritual death." What kind of a death is that? Until we are furnished with Bible evidence of such a death, we deny it. The only explanation of the phrase given as yet, is this: "That spirit that dwelt with him in his angelic purity took its departure to the God who gave it, and in its room we find the spirit of the evil one." We deny that man was angelic. We deny that any spirit went to God. By the way, there appears to be a contradiction here. One spirit is said to go away and another comes "in its room." Where, then, is the "spiritual death." There is just as much "spirit" after the "death" as before.

It is said that "the death resting upon the human race as a penalty for sin has no reference to decay, loss of consciousness, identity, &c. It is not so represented in the Bible." Now if there is anything "represented in the Bible" it is this very thing which our friend denies. He refers to Rom. v. 12. Let us quote it. "By one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned." Here is a clear reference to the garden of Eden. The "one man" was Adam; the sin was the eating of the forbidden fruit; the penalty of transgression was "death." What is death? We appeal to Worcester for the primary meaning: "Extinction of life; entire loss of vitality; that state of an organized being in which all its natural functions have ceased to act." Now this literal definition of death must stand unless cause can be shown to the contrary by the affirmative. Moreover, the same Apostle has established the fact that the death is "such as the animal experiences." He says in 1 Cor. xv. 21, "By man came death." What man? The next verse shows. "In Adam all die." The same death that is spoken of in Rom. v. 12. That it is literal death is settled by the context, "By man came death, by man came also the resurrection of the dead." Our friend will not deny the literality of the resurrection. But if the resurrection is literal, then the death is literal. Again: "As in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive." Our friend will not deny that the making alive is a quickening of those who are literally dead. But the death from which they are brought to life comes on them "in Adam." The short conclusion is,—If the death in 1 Cor. xv. 21, 22 is literal, then the death in Rom. v. 12 is literal; and if the latter is literal, then the threatened death in Eden was literal. As this death certainly "has reference to decay, loss of consciousness, identity, &c.," therefore the affirmative may safely desert his baseless theory of "spiritual death." Let him remember that "the Bible is the standard .... whatever it says we are bound to believe, and whatever it fails to say we have no right to add." It "says" death; it "fails to say" "spiritual death." And again: "The penalty was death; nothing more, nothing less. We are to understand here that God meant just what he said."

The difficulty in our friend's mind with reference to the import of "death" is indicated by his remark that "Adam did not die at the time promised, but lived several hundred years afterward." Our friend seeks to get rid of this obstacle by inventing a theory of "spiritual death" which runs counter to the whole Bible. It is better to leave a problem unsolved than to deny the first principles of revealed truth. The whole matter is clear to us. "The Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and man became"—just what every fish of the sea, every fowl of the air, every beast of the field, and every creeping thing was before man was made—"a living soul." "The first man was of the earth, earthy"—consequently a corruptible being. He was just as much a subject of dissolution, decay, and corruption as any other animal. The creature was made subject to vanity by reason of Him who subjected it, with a hope that through a wise choice and a proper development man would be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the liberty of the glory of a son of God. "For whom God did foreknow he also did predestinate to be conformed to the image of his Son, that he might be the first born among many brethren." Rom. viii.

God determined to put Adam on trial for immortality. For this purpose of trial "the Lord God planted a garden eastward in Eden .....And out of the ground made the Lord God to grow every tree....the tree of life also in the midst of the garden, and the tree of knowledge of good and evil." This was the place of trial. After it was prepared, "the Lord took Adam and put him into the garden of Eden," as a probationer for immortality. The tree of life was adapted to counteract the natural law of dissolution in Adam, and so long as he could partake of that tree he could not die. Here he was, then, a mortal man in an immortal residence, so to speak. The law of Eden was set forth, "Of every tree of the garden thou mayest freely eat: but of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, thou shalt not eat of it: for in the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die." Adam broke the commandment, ate of the forbidden fruit. The penalty was death. How should it be executed? It could not be visited in the garden, for there was the tree of life to prevent. Adam could not die in the garden. But the sentence had been declared. And the deed had been committed. Mark the fulfillment of the penalty. "And the Lord God said, Behold, the man"—has transgressed my law, has eaten of the forbidden fruit, and—"is become one of us, to know good and evil"—my sentence must be executed—"and now lest he put forth his hand, and take nevertheless"—notwithstanding my sentence—"of the tree of life, and eat, and live forever [continue his existence by means of the tree of life]; therefore"—to carry out the sentence—"the Lord sent him forth from the garden of Eden....and he placed at the east of the garden of Eden, cherubim, and a flaming sword which turned every way, to keep the way to the tree of life." Thus God did execute his sentence that very day: for Adam being expelled from the great death-preventive, became in that day subject to the law of corruption in his nature. Death was inevitable. Thus that death which was in one sense a consequence of natural law, was in another sense a consequence of disobedience—a penalty of sin. As Adam represented the entire race in his sin, the same natural death became a universal penalty. "By one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned." Says Dr. Chalmers: "Here is a common ground on which the certainties of divine revelation meet, and are at one with the certainties of human experience.... It is indeed a striking accordancy, that what in one view of it appears to be a uniform process of Nature, in another view of it, is but the unrelenting execution of a dread utterance from the God of Nature."

Our friend says that "the mission of Christ seems to be to restore to the human race what was lost in Adam." This we deny. If we are justified in the denial, we have no need to notice the inference that "if a natural death is the consequence of Adam's transgression then they that are in Christ will never die." Matt. xviii. 11 is quoted. "For the Son of man is come to save that which is lost." But not "what was lost in Adam." Keep to the Bible, and all will be well. The context shows the Saviour is speaking of lost men, who are to be "saved" from perishing in their own corruption.

QUESTIONS ABOUT THE BIBLE.

Will you tell me through "the Herald of Life"

1st. When and where the different books of the Bible were collected together and declared to be the Bible?

2d. Where is the proof that the different books of the Bible were written about the time that it is claimed they were written?

A. G. Hudson.

Response by J. T. C.

The foregoing has been on hand for some time. A proper answer would take up too much room in our columns. The information is furnished in standard works which are easily accessible. Smith's new Dictionary of the Bible is the best. We will say, however, that the answer to the questions may be obtained by any student of the English Bible; for the evidence as far as it goes, is internal—drawn from the books themselves. For instance, the contributor of the article on the Pentateuch in Smith's Dictionary goes into a lengthy discussion of its authorship, and then gives the results of his inquiry, which is valuable as his opinion, and no further. Another man might make the same inquiry, and come to a different conclusion. Our questioner may study the Bible for himself and be satisfied. We believe that the Scriptures, as we have them, have been more or less corrupted, largely through ignorance on the part of ancient transcribers. In some cases there have doubtless been deliberate additions, subtractions and alterations. Our only remedy is a rigid comparison of Scripture with Scripture, and spiritual things with spiritual.

No superficial reader of the Bible can be sure of his conclusions. The Bible was written for those who search it with the aid of reason and the Holy Spirit. Some remarks of Archbishop Whately are applicable here. He is discussing the question of the presumptive value of a supposed divine creed or system of doctrines, the effect of which he claims would be pernicious. His arguments appear to us equally forcible against a perfect Bible, which many seem to think must exist, or there is no basis for our faith.

"But besides the reason we have now been speaking of, there is another, perhaps not less important, against the providing in Scripture of a regular systematic statement of christian doctrines. Supposing such a summary of Gospel truths had been drawn up, and could have been contrived with such exquisite skill as to be sufficient and well adapted for all, of every Age and Country, what would have been the probable result? It would have commanded the unhesitating assent of all Christians; who would with deep veneration, have stored up the very words of it in their memory, without any need of laboriously searching the rest of the Scriptures, to ascertain its agreement with them; which is what we do (at least are evidently called on to do) with a human exposition of the faith: and the absence of this labor, together with the tranquil security as to the correctness of their belief which would have been thus generated, would have ended in a careless and contented apathy. There would have been no room for doubt,—no call for vigilant attention in the investigation of truth,—none of that effort of mind which is now requisite, in comparing one passage with another, and collecting instruction from the scattered, oblique, and incidental references to various doctrines in the existing Scriptures; and in consequence none of that excitement of the best feelings, and that improvement of the heart, which are the natural, and doubtless the designed result of an humble, diligent, and sincere study of the christian Scriptures.

"In fact, all study, properly so called, of the rest of Scripture,—all lively interest in its perusal,—would have been nearly superseded by such an inspired compendium of doctrine; to which alone, as far the most convenient for that purpose, habitual reference would have been made in any questions that might arise. Both would have been regarded, indeed, as of divine authority; but the compendium, as the fused and purified metal: the other, as the mine containing the crude ore. And the Compendium itself, being not like the existing Scriptures, that from which the faith is to be learned, but the very thing to be learned, would have come to be regarded by most with an indolent, unthinking veneration, which would have exercised little or no influence on the character.

"Their orthodoxy would have been, as it were, petrified, like the bodies of those animals we read of incrusted in the ice of the polar regions; firm-fixed, indeed, and preserved unchangeable, but cold, motionless, lifeless.

"It is only when our energies are roused, and our faculties exercised, and our attention kept awake, by an ardent pursuit of truth, and anxious watchfulness against error,—when, in short, we feel ourselves to be doing something towards acquiring or retaining, or improving our knowledge,—it is then only, that knowledge makes the requisite practical impression on the heart and on the conduct."

SOUTHERN PRISONS.

I think we ought all to take shame to ourselves, almost, that we have eaten and drunken, that we have lain down and risen up, and gone about our business and our pleasure, while our soldiers—the heroes and patriots whose breasts have made a living wall of defence betwixt us and our foes, were starving to death in the prisons of the South.

For a long time I thought what you probably did, reader, that the stories could not be true—they must be exaggerated, that it was not in the heart of a man to treat his brother as we were told that Southern soldiers treated Northern ones. Fiends might do these things; but men were not devils, and anything that fell below these could not practice the systematic, sickening barbarities which we read and heard that our own countrymen perpetrated on each other. But at last the evidence accumulated from sources that rendered the facts indisputable as the sun at noonday, and we knew that men—our own countrymen, in this nineteenth century, were being absolutely frozen, tortured, starved to death!

While I write this, it still seems incredible, but the awful horrors of Libby Prison, of Andersonville, of Sailsbury, are facts! One seized at any shadow of apologies for such cruelties; and when we heard that the South fed her prisoners as well as she did her armies, we hoped that this might in some degree, extenuate their treatment of our men. But Sherman's path through the fruitful fields of Georgia and the Carolinas, has settled all doubts on that head; neither before God or men has the South the faintest shadow of an excuse for dooming her prisoners of war to a slow death of freezing, starvation, cruelty. Read of them unclothed, unfed, haggard, staggering in dirt, in distress, reduced to idiocy, and longing for death. Oh, brothers, whose sufferings have wrought our deliverance, and made our country the proud, free, nation she is this day, my heart grows sick remembering how you suffered and died, and thinking of the low dark graves where you lie to-day, buried as good men would scorn to bury dogs and horses, with brutual jest, and sneer, and exultation. Who shall tell the story of your sorrows—who shall sing the song of your silent heroism! We your debtors can never do it. You bought for us the victory, and the peace which we enjoy to-day, and to you, under God, be the honor and the glory! We all know that magnanimity and generosity become conquerors—that courtesy and clemency are the part of victors towards the vanquished, and that the first duty of a Christian nation is to set an example of forbearance and forgivness.

But because of this shall we open the doors of our prisons? Shall we smile upon and take to our confidence highwaymen and murderers? Shall the men who rattled into Lawrence with the early dawn and slayed her helpless fathers, and sons, and brothers—shall the men who could see day by day the famishing eyes, the pinched faces, the skeleton forms of our starving men—shall they go unrebuked and unpunished?

At least let the names of those who had charge of these prisons, and who committed these appalling cruelties, be given to the world, and to the undying infamy which they deserve! Why, the names of Benedict Arnold and Aaron Burr grow luminous beside them.

I have heard Northern people say that Jefferson Davis was not "at the core a bad-hearted man." Did he know that in his own dominions stood, with their burdens of sin and suffering, these prison walls of agony crying unto God? Was it by his consent and authority that these things were?

I have known Northern men and women to praise General Robert E. Lee for a "courteous and kind-hearted gentleman." Did he ever, by word of his mouth or stroke of his pen, oppose or alleviate the sufferings that for all these years have been going on under his eyes? Where were the wives of these men that they did not with tears and supplications give their husbands no rest until they prevailed upon them to relieve the awful miseries that were going on by day and by night among their "prisoners of war?"

Is it not woman's place and duty to be pitiful and sympathetic when man is full of vengence and cruelty? Take the vilest crowd of criminals that were ever herded together beneath one prison roof, and tell to a woman throughout the whole North the half of such a story of horror as we have been told of husbands, and sons, and brothers, and if that woman would not risk her own life to carry food, clothing, medicines, to those men, she would be unworthy her name or her sex.

Dear reader, for the ignorant, misguided deluded South I think we ought to have little but sympathy and pity. Let us win them, by kindness and forbearance back to a new and better allegiance, and love to the Union. The thing that stood betwixt us, that awful power of darkness, even Slavery has passed away forever, and our future, our prosperity, our honor, is theirs also.

But does not a voice come up to us from the crowds of Southern graves where lie our heroic dead, crying, not for that vengeance "which is mine, saith the Lord," but demanding at least for truth and justice's sake that the names of the men who commanded and allowed, and those who executed these demoniac atrocities, shall be given to universal execration and infamy? And if they be men of culture and position, the greater be the horror which their work shall bring down on their own heads; and whether in high places or low, wherever and whatsoever they are, they deserve the wrath and execration of every honest soul throughout the earth. ELIJAH AND BAAL'S PROPHETS.

1 Kings, xviii. 25—46.

How poor a god is that of the ignorant and infatuated world! Elijah had made his proposal: both parties were to sacrifice a bullock, and each was to call on the name of his God. "And the God," said Elijah, "that answereth by fire, let him be God." And all the people agreed to it. "It is well spoken," cried they, as with one voice; and thus the important moment was now come, which should once for all decide whether there be a God in heaven, and who he was.

Elijah lost no time. He said unto the prophets of Baal, "Choose you one bullock for yourselves, and dress it first, for ye are many; and call on the name of your gods." He gives them the precedency on account of their numbers; "ye are many," you have the majority on your side. Yes, my brethren, this has always been the case in the present evil world, that the majority have taken the wrong side; and they so outnumber the little flock of Christ on earth, that they could, as it were, swallow them up, if the safety of the latter depended on their numbers.

"Ye are many!" Yes, indeed, numerous as the weeds of an uncultivated field; vessels of wrath everywhere; all Israel, except seven thousand, a remnant only preserved; all the rest in Samaria, and her towns and villages alienated from the life of God. And is it not just the same in many christian countries at present?

True it is, in this world they have the upper hand, and not without reason, for the prince of this world is their monarch. Hence they are honored and looked up to, and we are the offscouring of the people; they are the great and the wise, and we the fools. They are the party that have the judgment of the public in their favor, and the voice of the greatest geniuses, and of the most brilliant talents, and the applause of the public journals—and we! ah, if any one takes our part, he thinks he is doing a most condescending work of benevolence. We stand as a sort of criminals before the great public, and have no advocate but him who was in the form of a servant, and who, instead of defending our cause before the world, tells us that "his kingdom is not of this world," and bids us look to the future for our consolation.

What wonder is it that we appear utterly wretched and ridiculous to the world, when the very Judge to whom we appeal, is one whom they have long ago crucified? Well, be it so, ye sons and daughters of the father of lies! be the first and have the superiority—for ye are many. The Lord is at hand! Krummacher.

The American Churches and Negro Suffrage.

The buestion whether it is right to exclude American citizens from the right of suffrage on the sole ground of their color, is one of too much national importance for its discussion to be avoided.

To those who believe that all men are created equal, and ought, therefore, to be equal before the law, it must be very gratifying to observe that the influence of most of the religious denominations of the United States will be exercised on the right side.

The subject was referred to at the May anniversary of the American and Foreign Christian Union, a society which, before the outbreak of the Rebellion, carefully refrained from all politics. The Rev. Mr. Scudder took decided ground in favor of negro suffrage, and the audience showed by their applause that they agreed with him.

At the recent anniversary of the Baptist Home Mission Society, which represents one of the largest denominations of the United States, a resolution was unanimously adopted with respect to the freedmen, which declares it "to be both the undeniable right of the class referred to, and the indispensable condition of an assured peace and of the highest prosperity to the country, that they be invested with the elective franchise and with all the privileges of whatever kind that belong to American citizenship."

The Methodist Episcopal Church has this year no General Conference, but the language of the church papers, which so far as we know are unanimous with respect to this question, leaves no doubt that the whole influence of this Church will be cast in favor of equal rights for the negroes.

The New-School Presbyterians' have sufficiently indicated, by the cordial welcome which they have extended to the first colored delegates to a General Assembly of their Church, what position they intend to assume with regard to the question.

Five years ago the Old-School Presbyterians, as a denomination, would probably not have shown much sympathy with the advocacy of negro suffrage; but times have changed, and The New York Observer, which has so long been regarded as a leader among the conservative religious press, has this week an article favorable to the reform.

The old anti-Slavery Churches which have always excluded slaveholders from their communion—as the "Free-Will Baptists" and the "Church of God" (Winebrennarians), the "Free Methodists," "Independent Methodists," "Evangelical Association," and the Northern wing of the "Protestant Methodists," the "United Presbyterians," the "Reformed Presbyterians," the "United Brethren in Christ," and many other smaller Churches—are of course a unit in this question, and are unitedly laboring for the establishment of universal suffrage.—*N. Hoag's Vision.

As some published this vision several years since, and it is now re-appearing, we have concluded to give it an insertion for the purpose of accompanying it with a note. It is hardly possible to be too cautious in placing any reliance on "visions" in these last days, however pious the persons may be. The things spoken of in the following vision have actually transpired except the last part, on which we shall remark after giving the vision itself.

Joseph Hoag was on excellent man, and a minister in the Society of Friends, well known for his extensive labors and piety. At the date of his vision, in 1803, the Friends were a unit. After their separation, in 1827, he remained with the "Orthodox Friends." He died in 1846, aged 85. That he really had the vision we here present is attested by those who were intimate with him, and heard him relate it more than forty years ago. It is as follows:

"In the year 1803, in the eighth or ninth month, I was one day alone in the field, and observed that the sun shone clear, but a mist eclipsed its brightness. As I reflected upon the singularity of the event, my mind was struck into a silence the most solemn I ever remember to have witnessed, for all my faculties were low and unusually brought into deep silence. I said to myself, What can all this mean? I do not recollect ever before to have been sensible of such feelings.

"And I heard a voice from heaven, saying, 'This which thou seest is a sign of the present coming times. I took the forefathers of this country from a land of oppression; I planted them here among the people of the forest; I sustained them, and, while they were humble, I blessed them and fed them, and they became a numerous people. But they have now become proud, and have forgotten me, who nourished them and protected them in the wilderness, and are running into every ambition and evil practice of which the old countries were guilty, and have taken quietude from the land, and suffered a dividing spirit to come among them. Lift up thine eyes and behold! And I saw them dividing in great heat. The division began in the churches on points of doctrine. It commenced in the Presbyterian Society, and went through the various religious denominations, and in its progress and close its effects were the same. Those who dissented went off with high heads and taunting language, and those who kept to their original sentiments appeared exercised and sorrowful. And when the dividing spirit entered the society of Friends, it raged in as high degree as in any I had noticed or before discovered; and, as before, those who separated went off with lofty looks and taunting, censuring language. Those who kept their ancient principles retired by themselves. It next appeared in the Lodges of Free Masons; it broke out in appearance like a volcano, inasmuch as it set the country in an uproar for a time.

"Then it entered politics throughout the United States, and did not stop until it produced a civil war. An abundance of blood was shed in the course of the combat; the Southern States lost their power, and Slavery was annihilated from their borders. [Then a monarchical power sprang up, took the government of the States, established a national religion, and made all societies tributaries to support its expenses. I saw them take property from Friends. I was amazed at beholding all this, and I heard a voice proclaiming: 'This power shall not always stand, but with it I will chastise my church until they return to the faithfulness of their forefathers; thou seest what is coming upon thy native land, for their iniquities, and the blood of Africa, the remembrance of which has come up before me.']

"This vision is yet for many days. I had no idea of writing it for many years, until it became such a burden that for my own relief I have written it."

The concluding part of this vision we have inclosed in brackets for the purpose of stating that so much of it is of uncertain authority. Friend LINDLEY MURRAY MOORE, of Rochester, N. Y., a man now 77 years old, and an intimate friend of Mr. Hoag, who has often heard Mr. Hoag relate this vision, 30 or 40 years ago, was in our office a few days since, and said, he had no recollection of ever hearing Friend Hoag make that part of the statement: and he also said, that he was under the impression that Mr. Hoag's daughter, now living, has no recollection of that part of the vision relating to a "monarchical power." We can not suppose Friend Moore would have forgotten so remarkable a part of the vision, while all the other parts are so distinctly remembered by him. We accept so much of it as has been actually verified by facts, and we reject the remainder as an interpolation, and as not at all likely to be true as a part of the vision, or to be accomplished in fact: it is too absurd to be believed. "National religions" have had their day and received their doom; and one could not be established in this country without a more terrible conflict than that through which we have just passed.

The Holy Spirit.

The presence and agency of the Holy Spirit should be recognized, sought, cherished, and gratefully acknowledged; for upon this agency the Church is dependent for prosperity, progress, and power. Without it our prayers are not answered, the ceremonies of worship are formal and powerless, and the preaching of the gospel is comparatively in vain. The terrors of Sinai and the sweet accents of Calvary divested of living power, fall upon the listless ears, and the hearers remain insensible under the discipline of mercies and judgments. Every thoughtful Christian knows that when the Spirit of God is present in a congregation, Christians are instinct with life; they labor for Christ; they bear the cross cheerfully; devise and execute plans for the glory of God; they consecrate themselves, with all that they possess, to the service of Christ; they co-operate cheerfully in every good work, and the preaching of the gospel becomes the power of God in conversion and sanctification. But when the Spirit of God is not present, Christians are characterised by spiritual insensibility; they are not active and devoted; their prayers are listless and formal; they complain of the burden of the cross; they turn aside from the straight and narrow way, and seek a path to the kingdom of God strewn with flowers; they devise no liberal plans of usefulness, and oppose those devised by others; they withhold their gifts from the treasury of the Lord, and invest their substance in stocks, mortgages, and bonds. But the cause of truth languishes; the benevolent agencies are not prosecuted vigorously; the treasury of the Lord is not filled; expediency is made the rule of action; prudential maxims constitute the standard of morality; rites and forms are the chief manifestations of Christianity; religion is an incident, rather than an essential element of life, and in reference to the great interests of the future, the relation of cause and effect is disregarded.

What is Spiritual Life.

In endeavoring to supply an answer, from the oracles of God to this question, we observe:—

Spiritual life, considered in its radical principle, is the "incorruptible seed," the "seed" of God.—1 Peter. i. 23; 1 John iii. 9.

The apostle John distinguishes between the entire persons of the children of God, and that living and spiritual principle, or substance, by virtue of which they are the sons of God In so doing he speaks of "Whatsoever is born of God," and also of "Whosoever is born of God." And the idea of these distinguishable but inseparable realities (i. e., the seminal principle of spiritual life, and the person to whom that principle has been communicated), are by him thus presented:—"Whosoever is born of God doth not commit sin; for his seed remaineth in him; and he cannot sin because he is born of God."

Man is a corruptible being, and the children of men are born "of corruptible seed." But God is the incorruptible God, and his children are born again "of incorruptible seed, by or through the word of God which liveth and abideth forever." It is most certain that the truth of the gospel is the instrument through which they are begotten again; but that truth is inseparable from the person of the Incarnate Word who is "the Truth." The truth of the gospel is living truth, purely by virtue of its being identified with the living "Word of God,"—"the Word of life." Therefore, while the truth of the gospel is the medium of spiritual generation, and may be thus regarded as instrumentally conveying the seminal principle of spiritual life, it would be most unwise to confound in our minds the spiritual instrument of conveyance, with the incorruptible seed of God, who "is Spirit."

Spiritual life, in itself considered, is spirit; John. iii. 6, "That which is born of the flesh is flesh, and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit." Our Lord, before uttering this divine statement, said to Niocdemous, that, "Except a man be born again, he cannot see (perceive) the kingdom of God." He had thus spoken of the necessity of a new, a second and spiritual birth; and he had thus expressed his ideas of both analogy and contrast; analogy in respect to natural generation, as the origin and commencement of natural existence; and contrast in respect to spiritual generation, as the origin and commencement of spiritual being.

When he said, "That which is born of the flesh is flesh," he included in that saying the entireness of man's natural being, and also the evil moral qualities and mortal condition entailed by human generation. And when he thus spoke of the pro-creative energy, and of the offspring of the flesh, he used no metaphor nor figure of speech. Neither did he employ any figure of speech when he added, "and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit." A contrast, both physical and moral, is intended and expressed, between the offspring of "the Spirit" and the offspring of "the flesh."

When the divine teacher had said to Nicodemus, "Marvel not that I said unto thee, Ye must be born again," he added, "the wind bloweth where it listeth, and thou hearest the sound thereof, but canst not tell whence it cometh and whither it goeth; so is every one who is born of the Spirit." He had before spoken of a new and spiritual element of personal being—"That which is born of the Spirit;" and he here speaks of the persons who, by virtue of that new element, are declared to be themselves "born of the Spirit;" and of them he affirms, that they are incomprehensible by the intelligence and wisdom of the natural mind. It may possibly be thought that, in the above passage, our Lord is speaking of the mysteriousness of the Holy Spirit's operations, and that it is these he affirms to be incomprehensible; but his words are, "So is every one who is born of the Spirit." And as a manifest evidence of the truth of this statement, the unintelligent reply of Nicodemus was, "How can these things be?" His former question arose from his having supposed a second natural birth to have been spoken of; but this mistake was immediately corrected. Our Lord showed him that he did in truth speak of the necessity of a second birth, but of a birth, which is both new and spiritual. This necessity he enforced, by saying, "That which is born of the flesh is flesh, and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit." He intimated that this doctrine ought not to have excited the wonder of one who was himself a teacher of Israel, and, as such, a leader of the popular mind in the paths of reputed orthodoxy. And he further affirmed, as before noticed, that "every one who is born of the Spirit," is a being who is incomprehensible by mere human intelligence. But the perplexity and amazement of Nicodemus were only, and greatly so, increased by this fuller statement of the doctrine of spiritual regeneration; and hence his unenlightened reply—his skeptical exclamation.

Nicodemus was a Pharisee and a teacher of Israel, and may be deemed to have been acquainted with the writings of the prophets. In those writings God had made promises to Israel of "a new heart," and "a new spirit." He had also, in some instances, used similitudes to describe the moral qualities, and the experimental and practical effects of that same "new spirit." But Nicodemus had not, in respect to those promises, distinguished between a spiritual substance and its moral qualities, nor between real and inward causes and their corresponding effects. He had taken all those passages in the writings of the prophets to be simply metaphorical, that is, if he had at all regarded them; and he held them to denote "a great moral change," supposed to consist in "a re-adjustment of the faculties of the human soul." He had never learned that "the flesh profiteth nothing;" and that, however wrought up and modified, it is still flesh and not spirit. Therefore, when he fully knew that the divine Teacher inculcated the doctrine of a second—a new and spiritual birth, he was filled with wonder. (Wonder has been described to be "the effect of novelty upon ignorance," and as "an effect produced on a senseless imagination excited by a strong cause.") But had Nicodemus understood our Lord to speak of a metaphorical second birth—a moral change in the state and activities of the human soul, rather than a new and spiritual element of personal being—this doubtless, would have been no such novelty to his mind, as to have excited his incredulity His philosophy could undoubtedly have mastered the conception of such a "great change;" but the utmost exercise of his natural wisdom could not comprehend "one who is born of the Spirit." His confusion of thought and of feeling was perfectly known to the divine Teacher; but he did not seek to relieve his perplexed inquirer, and to reduce the mental chaos to order and harmony, by intimating that his words were to be taken figuratively, and not literally. He only added to the force and effects of his previous statements; and at the same time, conveyed to the mind of Nicodemus a keen but merciful rebuke. As calling in question his ministerial competency, and reproving his ignorance and unbelief, He "answered and said unto him, Art thou a teacher of Israel, and knowest not these things? Verily, verily, I say unto thee, we speak that we do know, and testify that we have seen; and ye receive not our witness." K.

Spirit: What is it?

"But there is a spirit in man."—Job xxxii. 8.

To determine the importance of the term Spirit, under every variety of circumstance in which it may be used in the sacred writings is a task which neither our space nor our design warrant us to undertake.

Treatises commensurate with such a view of the subject already exist, and by a reference to these the reader can easily satisfy himself on those points which lie beyond the limits of the following remarks. Our present object is very simple, and concerns merely the question—What is the spirit of man? In answering which we are desirous of echoing only the testimony of Scripture, whose verdict we feel bound to regard as for ever decisive. And, as the language of our text is at once positive and direct, we would respectfully submit what appears to us its fair and natural meaning; a meaning we presume in strict harmony with the universal deliverances of both the Old and New Testament.

The statement reads: "But there is a spirit in man."

Now, the first thing which strikes us here is the evident distinction between the spirit and the man. To this distinction we wish particularly to call attention, inasmuch as the theory about the human spirit which now floats in the minds of Christendom, is borne up solely through an obstinate disregard of this plain scripture fact.

This will at once appear if we attend for a moment to the difference between the assertion that man is a spirit, or spiritual being; and the assertion that man has a spirit, a something which, while performing an essential function in his constitution, is not to be regarded as a distinct entity, according to the prevailing notion.

The former of these propositions, it will be seen, is plainly negatived by the latter; and as the proof of one must necessarily be the refutation of the other, we will briefly adduce what seems to us clear and decided evidence in support of the proposition, which affirms, that the spirit in man is only an attribute of his physical organism, and is in no respect to be regarded as capable of a separate and independent conscious existence.

And here the term itself claims primary attention. The word spirit, which, whatever may be the sense attached to it in actual usage, is the English equivalent for the Hebrew ruach, and the Greek pneuma, both of which, according to lexicographers, radically import breath. The term is used in a variety of senses throughout scripture, but in every case, except when intended as a metaphor, when spoken of man, it is to be held simply as a synonyme for breath.

The primary relation which this breath or spirit sustains to man is not intimated in the text, but as both the philosophy and the facts of human existence demonstrate this, we have only to reflect on the state of man when bereft of his breathing powers, or, as orthodox conventionalism would have it, "when his spirit has departed," in order to ascertain the exact nature of the union. Immediately breathing ceases, life is at an end, and all mental and moral faculties at once paralyzed. The functions, then, of the breath or spirit in man, is no other than the maintenance of life, his deprivation of it producing the phenomenon we call death, which we hesitate not to pronounce complete in relation to all that constituted the sentient being.

Hence seems to have originated the phrase, "breath of life,"—breathing, or the respiration of the electrified air by the lungs, being essential to all flesh (Gen. vi. 17.)

This being the case, it is certainly not stretching language too far to speak of the breath or spirit as the "vital principle," or life-sustaining power, life being connected with the performance of its functions in the human system.

This will help to account for that class of passages where "spirit," which as above defined, literally denotes breath, is spoken of as the life itself, and sometimes even as equivalent to the whole man; Man being regarded as consisting of "soul, body and spirit," or, more simply, as an organized being, kept alive by breathing, the withdrawal of which breath or spirit, resulting in nothing less than the total dissolution or annihilation of his conscious being. Hence Elihu, "If he (the Almighty) set his heart upon man, if he gather unto himself his spirit and his breath, all flesh shall perish together, and man shall turn to dust."—Job xxxiv. 14, 15. And again the Psalmist, "His (man's) breath (or spirit) goeth forth, he returneth to his earth; in that very day his thoughts perish."—Ps. cxlvi. 4. So also Solomon, "Then (at death) shall the dust return to the earth as it was, and the spirit (or breath) unto God who gave it."—Ecclesiastees xii. 7.

This review of the spirit of man may appear to some as inconsistent with such passages as ascribe to it personality and intelligent attributes.

To this we can only make the general reply, that though at first sight, inconsistent with some of the language employed, a careful examination of the real import of terms will satisfy an impartial reader, whose mind has not been wholly "spoiled through philosophy and vain deceit," that neither personality nor intelligence are to be attributed to the human spirit; but, rather, that the "spirit in man," being the principle or power through whose agency, in connection with the mechanical parts of the human organism, intelligence is produced and identity or personality maintained, they are rhetorically predicated of the spirit itself.

This is clearly established by the fact, that in numerous instances personality and intelligence are alike referred to soul and body, and spirit; as "my soul," "my flesh," "my spirit;" so that if it be contended that the "my" in cases where spirit is intended, proves its distinct intelligence and separate identity, then, on the same ground, we are authorized to maintain the essential personality and intelligence of soul and body; and man, instead of being a simple self-conscious unity, is to be regarded as a triune compound of consciousnesses; which, is only in other words, to say, that man is three distinct persons,—an hypothesis at once unphilosophical, irrational and unscriptural.

From all, then, which we can discover from the Book, we think we may safely presume that the "spirit in man" and the work it performs in his constitution, while indispensable to his existence and development, is no more independent of the laws which regulate this physical organism, than the liver which secretes bile, or the heart which propels blood through his veins.

At this conclusion we can imagine many "orthodox believers" to start back in absolute despair, while the exclamations "infidelity" and "atheism" sound forth the pious horror which possesses them at the thought, which divests man's nature of that mysterious and God-like principle, of which his future existence is supposed only to be predicable.

To such we would say, pause and reflect. The truth is even as we have said. But then—what then? Certainly not despair! Not Infidelity! Not Atheism! Nay! If infidelity or atheism exists, it is all on the other side. For what is our position? Why this: That the popular grounds on which hopes of futurity are reared, are altogether false and unscriptural!

Yea, and further, that till the delusion is dispelled, the mass of believers are without the shadow of a shade of evidence that there shall be any future state at all.

Platonic, or may we not rather say Satanic?—arguments indorsing the "immortality of the soul" or the "indestructibility of spirit," may be adduced—Gen. iii. 4, 5; but beyond this the creeds of Christendom at present think it not expedient to pass.

Infidelity, forsooth! Yes, 'tis, alas! too patent to be denied, for, what with immortal soul and spirit-ism, and other kindred creations of the pagan mind, Bible testimony is hushed—her august deliverances on the nature and destiny of man silenced, and the groundless speculations of "divines" substituted in their room.

But this must end. The Bible is struggling to be heard again: and to aid her emancipation from the thraldom of the bigotry and intolerance under which she has been groaning during these centuries of darkness and superstition, we would here echo her voice on behalf of a mortal and death-doomed race—by announcing Resurrection and Life, as Heaven's one grand pledge for the redemption of humanity,—when from the dark confines of oblivion the conqueror of hades shall summon the candidates for "Glory, honor and immortality!"

J. H. S.

Hell—Hell Fire.

A proper understanding of the above terms will help us in the settlement of the question as to what is the end of the wicked. It is known to all that there are two Greek words which our translators have rendered hell, in our Bible. One is "hades," and is never used to denote the punishment of sinners: the other is "Gehenna," and is the term employed in speaking of the end of the wicked. This last term was perfectly understood among the Jews; and would be to us were it not for the obscurity that it has among persons who do not know to what reference is made where that term is employed. Divines studiously keep the true reference of the term "hell fire"—"gebenna"—out of night. Says The Polymicrian Greek Lexion to the New Testament, "Gehenna, properly the valley of Hinnom, south of Jerusalem: once celebrated for the horrid worship of Moloch, and afterwards polluted with every species of filth, as well as the carcases of animals, and dead bodies of malefactors; to consume which, in order to avert the pestilence which such a mass of corruption would occasion, constant fires were kept burning."

Now, with such scenes and facts before our eyes, there could none, who heard our Lord speak of the end of the wicked, mistake his meaning. The impenitent and incorrigible sinner, like the filth about Jerusalem, and the dead bodies of animals and men, if not utterly consumed, would keep alive the plague in the universe; hence, they shall be "cast into Gehenna"—hell fire. Therefore, "fear him who is able to destroy both soul and body in Gehenna—hell."—Mat. x. 28. Just as certain as the filth about Jerusalem, and dead carcases were cast into the burning fire of the valley of Hinnom, and utterly consumed, just so certain will God destroy both soul and body—i. e., the entire being of the incorrigible sinner. That is the plain common sense meaning of our Lord's language; and he was in no danger of being misunderstood by those who heard him. And it remained for the corruptions of Papacy to bring up eternal torments in a state of consciousness; and it came into being, along with the doctrine of "immortal soul," which last mentioned doctrine has given birth to all the fooleries, tuperstitions, and blasphemies of the church of Rome. Luther, when he first came out against that corrupt church, as may be seen in his defence published in 1530, says—"I permit the Pope to make articles of faith for himself and his faithful; such as that he is Emperor of the world—King of heaven, and God upon earth—that the soul is immortal, with all those monstrous opinions to be found in the Roman dunghill of decretals."

Thus, in the first onset against "the mother of harlots," he laid "the axe at the root of the tree;" and had he not given way to the opposition of brother Reformers, papacy would have been "consumed" long ago. For, take away the doctrine that the soul out of Christ is immortal: and let the truth come to light, that "the dead know not anything," and you "eat the flesh" of "the mother of harlots and burn her with fire." She can't live in such a scorching sun. It strips her of her Virgin Mary—Peter—and all her saints, that she worships; and marks her as rank an idolator as the most stupid Hindoo. This is a self-evident truth. Just convince any man that no soul is immortal out of Christ,—that the dead are unconscious—and that our entire future existence depends on the resurrection of the dead, and he never can be a papist: the very fountain of papacy is dried up, and it is numbered among the things that "was and is not."

Why should Protestants, then, cling to doctrines the only use of which is to feed Papacy—convert men into infidels, and make universalists? or to send them after the strong delusion of "spirit rappings"? "The soul that sinneth it shall die." But, "to them, who by patient continuance in well-doing, seek for honor, and glory, and immortality, eternal life." "The dead know not anything;" but the dead in Christ shall rise again; this is certain, because God has promised it, and the demonstration of it is in the resurrection of our Lord Jesus Christ; but "if the dead rise not"—"then they also which are fallen asleep in Christ are perished." The Christian's hope, then, is in the resurrection of the dead at the advent of Christ: and the end of the wicked is, that "he shall perish forever, like his own dung."—Job xx. 7—that he shall "burn up, saith the Lord of Hosts," and be left "neither root" nor "branch;" yea, "utterly perish;" 2 Peter ii. 13. And "Babylon," the whole of her shall be "burned with fire;" and "that great city shall be thrown down, and shall be found no more at all."—Rev. xviii 8, 21.

answereth by fire, let him be God." And all the people agreed to it. "It is well spoken," cried they, as with one voice; and thus the important moment was now come, which should once for all decide whether there be a God in heaven, and who he was.

Elijah lost no time. He said unto the prophets of Baal, "Choose you one bullock for yourselves, and dress it first, for ye are many; and call on the name of your gods." He gives them the precedency on account of their numbers; "ye are many," you have the majority on your side. Yes, my brethren, this has always been the case in the present evil world, that the majority have taken the wrong side; and they so outnumber the little flock of Christ on earth, that they could, as it were, swallow them up, if the safety of the latter depended on their numbers.

"Ye are many!" Yes, indeed, numerous as the weeds of an uncultivated field; vessels of wrath everywhere; all Israel, except seven thousand, a remnant only preserved; all the rest in Samaria, and her towns and villages alienated from the life of God. And is it not just the same in many christian countries at present?

True it is, in this world they have the upper hand, and not without reason, for the prince of this world is their monarch. Hence they are honored and looked up to, and we are the offscouring of the people; they are the great and the wise, and we the fools. They are the party that have the judgment of the public in their favor, and the voice of the greatest geniuses, and of the most brilliant talents, and the applause of the public journals—and we! ah, if any one takes our part, he thinks he is doing a most condescending work of benevolence. We stand as a sort of criminals before the great public, and have no advocate but him who was in the form of a servant, and who, instead of defending our cause before the world, tells us that "his kingdom is not of this world," and bids us look to the future for our consolation.

What wonder is it that we appear utterly wretched and ridiculous to the world, when the very Judge to whom we appeal, is one whom they have long ago crucified? Well, be it so, ye sons and daughters of the father of lies! be the first and have the superiority—for ye are many. The Lord is at hand! Krummacher.

The American Churches and Negro Suffrage.

The buestion whether it is right to exclude American citizens from the right of suffrage on the sole ground of their color, is one of too much national importance for its discussion to be avoided.

To those who believe that all men are created equal, and ought, therefore, to be equal before the law, it must be very gratifying to observe that the influence of most of the religious denominations of the United States will be exercised on the right side.

The subject was referred to at the May anniversary of the American and Foreign Christian Union, a society which, before the outbreak of the Rebellion, carefully refrained from all politics. The Rev. Mr. Scudder took decided ground in favor of negro suffrage, and the audience showed by their applause that they agreed with him.

At the recent anniversary of the Baptist Home Mission Society, which represents one of the largest denominations of the United States, a resolution was unanimously adopted with respect to the freedmen, which declares it "to be both the undeniable right of the class referred to, and the indispensable condition of an assured peace and of the highest prosperity to the country, that they be invested with the elective franchise and with all the privileges of whatever kind that belong to American citizenship."

The Methodist Episcopal Church has this year no General Conference, but the language of the church papers, which so far as we know are unanimous with respect to this question, leaves no doubt that the whole influence of this Church will be cast in favor of equal rights for the negroes.

The New-School Presbyterians' have sufficiently indicated, by the cordial welcome which they have extended to the first colored delegates to a General Assembly of their Church, what position they intend to assume with regard to the question.

Five years ago the Old-School Presbyterians, as a denomination, would probably not have shown much sympathy with the advocacy of negro suffrage; but times have changed, and The New York Observer, which has so long been regarded as a leader among the conservative religious press, has this week an article favorable to the reform.

The old anti-Slavery Churches which have always excluded slaveholders from their communion—as the "Free-Will Baptists" and the "Church of God" (Winebrennarians), the "Free Methodists," "Independent Methodists," "Evangelical Association," and the Northern wing of the "Protestant Methodists," the "United Presbyterians," the "Reformed Presbyterians," the "United Brethren in Christ," and many other smaller Churches—are of course a unit in this question, and are unitedly laboring for the establishment of universal suffrage.—*N. Hoag's Vision.

As some published this vision several years since, and it is now re-appearing, we have concluded to give it an insertion for the purpose of accompanying it with a note. It is hardly possible to be too cautious in placing any reliance on "visions" in these last days, however pious the persons may be. The things spoken of in the following vision have actually transpired except the last part, on which we shall remark after giving the vision itself.

Joseph Hoag was on excellent man, and a minister in the Society of Friends, well known for his extensive labors and piety. At the date of his vision, in 1803, the Friends were a unit. After their separation, in 1827, he remained with the "Orthodox Friends." He died in 1846, aged 85. That he really had the vision we here present is attested by those who were intimate with him, and heard him relate it more than forty years ago. It is as follows:

"In the year 1803, in the eighth or ninth month, I was one day alone in the field, and observed that the sun shone clear, but a mist eclipsed its brightness. As I reflected upon the singularity of the event, my mind was struck into a silence the most solemn I ever remember to have witnessed, for all my faculties were low and unusually brought into deep silence. I said to myself, What can all this mean? I do not recollect ever before to have been sensible of such feelings.

"And I heard a voice from heaven, saying, 'This which thou seest is a sign of the present coming times. I took the forefathers of this country from a land of oppression; I planted them here among the people of the forest; I sustained them, and, while they were humble, I blessed them and fed them, and they became a numerous people. But they have now become proud, and have forgotten me, who nourished them and protected them in the wilderness, and are running into every ambition and evil practice of which the old countries were guilty, and have taken quietude from the land, and suffered a dividing spirit to come among them. Lift up thine eyes and behold! And I saw them dividing in great heat. The division began in the churches on points of doctrine. It commenced in the Presbyterian Society, and went through the various religious denominations, and in its progress and close its effects were the same. Those who dissented went off with high heads and taunting language, and those who kept to their original sentiments appeared exercised and sorrowful. And when the dividing spirit entered the society of Friends, it raged in as high degree as in any I had noticed or before discovered; and, as before, those who separated went off with lofty looks and taunting, censuring language. Those who kept their ancient principles retired by themselves. It next appeared in the Lodges of Free Masons; it broke out in appearance like a volcano, inasmuch as it set the country in an uproar for a time.

"Then it entered politics throughout the United States, and did not stop until it produced a civil war. An abundance of blood was shed in the course of the combat; the Southern States lost their power, and Slavery was annihilated from their borders. [Then a monarchical power sprang up, took the government of the States, established a national religion, and made all societies tributaries to support its expenses. I saw them take property from Friends. I was amazed at beholding all this, and I heard a voice proclaiming: 'This power shall not always stand, but with it I will chastise my church until they return to the faithfulness of their forefathers; thou seest what is coming upon thy native land, for their iniquities, and the blood of Africa, the remembrance of which has come up before me.']

"This vision is yet for many days. I had no idea of writing it for many years, until it became such a burden that for my own relief I have written it."

The concluding part of this vision we have inclosed in brackets for the purpose of stating that so much of it is of uncertain authority. Friend LINDLEY MURRAY MOORE, of Rochester, N. Y., a man now 77 years old, and an intimate friend of Mr. Hoag, who has often heard Mr. Hoag relate this vision, 30 or 40 years ago, was in our office a few days since, and said, he had no recollection of ever hearing Friend Hoag make that part of the statement: and he also said, that he was under the impression that Mr. Hoag's daughter, now living, has no recollection of that part of the vision relating to a "monarchical power." We can not suppose Friend Moore would have forgotten so remarkable a part of the vision, while all the other parts are so distinctly remembered by him. We accept so much of it as has been actually verified by facts, and we reject the remainder as an interpolation, and as not at all likely to be true as a part of the vision, or to be accomplished in fact: it is too absurd to be believed. "National religions" have had their day and received their doom; and one could not be established in this country without a more terrible conflict than that through which we have just passed.

The Holy Spirit.

The presence and agency of the Holy Spirit should be recognized, sought, cherished, and gratefully acknowledged; for upon this agency the Church is dependent for prosperity, progress, and power. Without it our prayers are not answered, the ceremonies of worship are formal and powerless, and the preaching of the gospel is comparatively in vain. The terrors of Sinai and the sweet accents of Calvary divested of living power, fall upon the listless ears, and the hearers remain insensible under the discipline of mercies and judgments. Every thoughtful Christian knows that when the Spirit of God is present in a congregation, Christians are instinct with life; they labor for Christ; they bear the cross cheerfully; devise and execute plans for the glory of God; they consecrate themselves, with all that they possess, to the service of Christ; they co-operate cheerfully in every good work, and the preaching of the gospel becomes the power of God in conversion and sanctification. But when the Spirit of God is not present, Christians are characterised by spiritual insensibility; they are not active and devoted; their prayers are listless and formal; they complain of the burden of the cross; they turn aside from the straight and narrow way, and seek a path to the kingdom of God strewn with flowers; they devise no liberal plans of usefulness, and oppose those devised by others; they withhold their gifts from the treasury of the Lord, and invest their substance in stocks, mortgages, and bonds. But the cause of truth languishes; the benevolent agencies are not prosecuted vigorously; the treasury of the Lord is not filled; expediency is made the rule of action; prudential maxims constitute the standard of morality; rites and forms are the chief manifestations of Christianity; religion is an incident, rather than an essential element of life, and in reference to the great interests of the future, the relation of cause and effect is disregarded.

What is Spiritual Life.

In endeavoring to supply an answer, from the oracles of God to this question, we observe:—

Spiritual life, considered in its radical principle, is the "incorruptible seed," the "seed" of God.— 1 Peter. i. 23; 1 John iii. 9.

The apostle John distinguishes between the entire persons of the children of God, and that living and spiritual principle, or substance, by virtue of which they are the sons of God In so doing he speaks of "Whatsoever is born of God," and also of "Whosoever is born of God." And the idea of these distinguishable but inseparable realities (i. e., the seminal principle of spiritual life, and the person to whom that principle has been communicated), are by him thus presented:—"Whosoever is born of God doth not commit sin; for his seed remaineth in him; and he cannot sin because he is born of God."

Man is a corruptible being, and the children of men are born "of corruptible seed." But God is the incorruptible God, and his children are born again "of incorruptible seed, by or through the word of God which liveth and abideth forever." It is most certain that the truth of the gospel is the instrument through which they are begotten again; but that truth is inseparable from the person of the Incarnate Word who is "the Truth." The truth of the gospel is living truth, purely by virtue of its being identified with the living "Word of God,"—"the Word of life." Therefore, while the truth of the gospel is the medium of spiritual generation, and may be thus regarded as instrumentally conveying the seminal principle of spiritual life, it would be most unwise to confound in our minds the spiritual instrument of conveyance, with the incorruptible seed of God, who "is Spirit."

Spiritual life, in itself considered, is spirit; John. iii. 6, "That which is born of the flesh is flesh, and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit." Our Lord, before uttering this divine statement, said to Nicodemous, that, "Except a man be born again, he cannot see (perceive) the kingdom of God." He had thus spoken of the necessity of a new, a second and spiritual birth; and he had thus expressed his ideas of both analogy and contrast; analogy in respect to natural generation, as the origin and commencement of natural existence; and contrast in respect to spiritual generation, as the origin and commencement of spiritual being.

When he said, "That which is born of the flesh is flesh," he included in that saying the entireness of man's natural being, and also the evil moral qualities and mortal condition entailed by human generation. And when he thus spoke of the pro-creative energy, and of the offspring of the flesh, he used no metaphor nor figure of speech. Neither did he employ any figure of speech when he added, "and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit." A contrast, both physical and moral, is intended and expressed, between the offspring of "the Spirit" and the offspring of "the flesh."

When the divine teacher had said to Nicodemus, "Marvel not that I said unto thee, Ye must be born again," he added, "the wind bloweth where it listeth, and thou hearest the sound thereof, but canst not tell whence it cometh and whither it goeth; so is every one who is born of the Spirit." He had before spoken of a new and spiritual element of personal being—"That which is born of the Spirit;" and he here speaks of the persons who, by virtue of that new element, are declared to be themselves "born of the Spirit;" and of them he affirms, that they are incomprehensible by the intelligence and wisdom of the natural mind. It may possibly be thought that, in the above passage, our Lord is speaking of the mysteriousness of the Holy Spirit's operations, and that it is these he affirms to be incomprehensible; but his words are, "So is every one who is born of the Spirit." And as a manifest evidence of the truth of this statement, the unintelligent reply of Nicodemus was, "How can these things be?" His former question arose from his having supposed a second natural birth to have been spoken of; but this mistake was immediately corrected. Our Lord showed him that he did in truth speak of the necessity of a second birth, but of a birth, which is both new and spiritual. This necessity he enforced, by saying, "That which is born of the flesh is flesh, and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit." He intimated that this doctrine ought not to have excited the wonder of one who was himself a teacher of Israel, and, as such, a leader of the popular mind in the paths of reputed orthodoxy. And he further affirmed, as before noticed, that "every one who is born of the Spirit," is a being who is incomprehensible by mere human intelligence. But the perplexity and amazement of Nicodemus were only, and greatly so, increased by this fuller statement of the doctrine of spiritual regeneration; and hence his unenlightened reply—his skeptical exclamation.

Nicodemus was a Pharisee and a teacher of Israel, and may be deemed to have been acquainted with the writings of the prophets. In those writings God had made promises to Israel of "a new heart," and "a new spirit." He had also, in some instances, used similitudes to describe the moral qualities, and the experimental and practical effects of that same "new spirit." But Nicodemus had not, in respect to those promises, distinguished between a spiritual substance and its moral qualities, nor between real and inward causes and their corresponding effects. He had taken all those passages in the writings of the prophets to be simply metaphorical, that is, if he had at all regarded them; and he held them to denote "a great moral change," supposed to consist in "a re-adjustment of the faculties of the human soul." He had never learned that "the flesh profiteth nothing;" and that, however wrought up and modified, it is still flesh and not spirit. Therefore, when he fully knew that the divine Teacher inculcated the doctrine of a second—a new and spiritual birth, he was filled with wonder. (Wonder has been described to be "the effect of novelty upon ignorance," and as "an effect produced on a senseless imagination excited by a strong cause.") But had Nicodemus understood our Lord to speak of a metaphorical second birth—a moral change in the state and activities of the human soul, rather than a new and spiritual element of personal being—this doubtless, would have been no such novelty to his mind, as to have excited his incredulity His philosophy could undoubtedly have mastered the conception of such a "great change;" but the utmost exercise of his natural wisdom could not comprehend "one who is born of the Spirit." His confusion of thought and of feeling was perfectly known to the divine Teacher; but he did not seek to relieve his perplexed inquirer, and to reduce the mental chaos to order and harmony, by intimating that his words were to be taken figuratively, and not literally. He only added to the force and effects of his previous statements; and at the same time, conveyed to the mind of Nicodemus a keen but merciful rebuke. As calling in question his ministerial competency, and reproving his ignorance and unbelief, He "answered and said unto him, Art thou a teacher of Israel, and knowest not these things? Verily, verily, I say unto thee, we speak that we do know, and testify that we have seen; and ye receive not our witness." K.

Spirit: What is it?

"But there is a spirit in man."—Job xxxii. 8.

To determine the importance of the term Spirit, under every variety of circumstance in which it may be used in the sacred writings is a task which neither our space nor our design warrant us to undertake.

Treatises commensurate with such a view of the subject already exist, and by a reference to these the reader can easily satisfy himself on those points which lie beyond the limits of the following remarks. Our present object is very simple, and concerns merely the question—What is the spirit of man? In answering which we are desirous of echoing only the testimony of Scripture, whose verdict we feel bound to regard as for ever decisive. And, as the language of our text is at once positive and direct, we would respectfully submit what appears to us its fair and natural meaning; a meaning we presume in strict harmony with the universal deliverances of both the Old and New Testament.

The statement reads: "But there is a spirit in man."

Now, the first thing which strikes us here is the evident distinction between the spirit and the man. To this distinction we wish particularly to call attention, inasmuch as the theory about the human spirit which now floats in the minds of Christendom, is borne up solely through an obstinate disregard of this plain scripture fact.

This will at once appear if we attend for a moment to the difference between the assertion that man is a spirit, or spiritual being; and the assertion that man has a spirit, a something which, while performing an essential function in his constitution, is not to be regarded as a distinct entity, according to the prevailing notion.

The former of these propositions, it will be seen, is plainly negatived by the latter; and as the proof of one must necessarily be the refutation of the other, we will briefly adduce what seems to us clear and decided evidence in support of the proposition, which affirms, that the spirit in man is only an attribute of his physical organism, and is in no respect to be regarded as capable of a separate and independent conscious existence.

And here the term itself claims primary attention. The word spirit, which, whatever may be the sense attached to it in actual usage, is the English equivalent for the Hebrew ruach, and the Greek pneuma, both of which, according to lexicographers, radically import breath. The term is used in a variety of senses throughout scripture, but in every case, except when intended as a metaphor, when spoken of man, it is to be held simply as a synonyme for breath.

The primary relation which this breath or spirit sustains to man is not intimated in the text, but as both the philosophy and the facts of human existence demonstrate this, we have only to reflect on the state of man when bereft of his breathing powers, or, as orthodox conventionalism would have it, "when his spirit has departed," in order to ascertain the exact nature of the union. Immediately breathing ceases, life is at an end, and all mental and moral faculties at once paralyzed. The functions, then, of the breath or spirit in man, is no other than the maintenance of life, his deprivation of it producing the phenomenon we call death, which we hesitate not to pronounce complete in relation to all that constituted the sentient being.

Hence seems to have originated the phrase, "breath of life,"—breathing, or the respiration of the electrified air by the lungs, being essential to all flesh (Gen. vi. 17.)

This being the case, it is certainly not stretching language too far to speak of the breath or spirit as the "vital principle," or life-sustaining power, life being connected with the performance of its functions in the human system.

This will help to account for that class of passages where "spirit," which as above defined, literally denotes breath, is spoken of as the life itself, and sometimes even as equivalent to the whole man; Man being regarded as consisting of "soul, body and spirit," or, more simply, as an organized being, kept alive by breathing, the withdrawal of which breath or spirit, resulting in nothing less than the total dissolution or annihilation of his conscious being. Hence Elihu, "If he (the Almighty) set his heart upon man, if he gather unto himself his spirit and his breath, all flesh shall perish together, and man shall turn to dust."—Job xxxiv. 14, 15. And again the Psalmist, "His (man's) breath (or spirit) goeth forth, he returneth to his earth; in that very day his thoughts perish."—Ps. cxlvi. 4. So also Solomon, "Then (at death) shall the dust return to the earth as it was, and the spirit (or breath) unto God who gave it."—Ecclesiastees xii. 7.

This review of the spirit of man may appear to some as inconsistent with such passages as ascribe to it personality and intelligent attributes.

To this we can only make the general reply, that though at first sight, inconsistent with some of the language employed, a careful examination of the real import of terms will satisfy an impartial reader, whose mind has not been wholly "spoiled through philosophy and vain deceit," that neither personality nor intelligence are to be attributed to the human spirit; but, rather, that the "spirit in man," being the principle or power through whose agency, in connection with the mechanical parts of the human organism, intelligence is produced and identity or personality maintained, they are rhetorically predicated of the spirit itself.

This is clearly established by the fact, that in numerous instances personality and intelligence are alike referred to soul and body, and spirit; as "my soul," "my flesh," "my spirit;" so that if it be contended that the "my" in cases where spirit is intended, proves its distinct intelligence and separate identity, then, on the same ground, we are authorized to maintain the essential personality and intelligence of soul and body; and man, instead of being a simple self-conscious unity, is to be regarded as a triune compound of consciousnesses; which, is only in other words, to say, that man is three distinct persons,—an hypothesis at once unphilosophical, irrational and unscriptural.

From all, then, which we can discover from the Book, we think we may safely presume that the "spirit in man" and the work it performs in his constitution, while indispensable to his existence and development, is no more independent of the laws which regulate this physical organism, than the liver which secretes bile, or the heart which propels blood through his veins.

At this conclusion we can imagine many "orthodox believers" to start back in absolute despair, while the exclamations "infidelity" and "atheism" sound forth the pious horror which possesses them at the thought, which divests man's nature of that mysterious and God-like principle, of which his future existence is supposed only to be predicable.

To such we would say, pause and reflect. The truth is even as we have said. But then—what then? Certainly not despair! Not Infidelity! Not Atheism! Nay! If infidelity or atheism exists, it is all on the other side. For what is our position? Why this: That the popular grounds on which hopes of futurity are reared, are altogether false and unscriptural!

Yea, and further, that till the delusion is dispelled, the mass of believers are without the shadow of a shade of evidence that there shall be any future state at all.

Platonic, or may we not rather say Satanic?—arguments indorsing the "immortality of the soul" or the "indistructibility of spirit," may be adduced—Gen. iii. 4, 5; but beyond this the creeds of Christendom at present think it not expedient to pass.

Infidelity, forsooth! Yes, 'tis, alas! too patent to be denied, for, what with immortal soul and spirit-ism, and other kindred creations of the pagan mind, Bible testimony is hushed—her august deliverances on the nature and destiny of man silenced, and the groundless speculations of "divines" substituted in their room.

But this must end. The Bible is struggling to be heard again: and to aid her emancipation from the thraldom of the bigotry and intolerance under which she has been groaning during these centuries of darkness and superstition, we would here echo her voice on behalf of a mortal and death-doomed race—by announcing Resurrection and Life, as Heaven's one grand pledge for the redemption of humanity,—when from the dark confines of oblivion the conqueror of hades shall summon the candidates for "Glory, honor and immortality!"

J. H. S.

Hell—Hell Fire.

A proper understanding of the above terms will help us in the settlement of the question as to what is the end of the wicked. It is known to all that there are two Greek words which our translators have rendered hell, in our Bible. One is "hades," and is never used to denote the punishment of sinners: the other is "Gehenna," and is the term employed in speaking of the end of the wicked. This last term was perfectly understood among the Jews; and would be to us were it not for the obscurity that it has among persons who do not know to what reference is made where that term is employed. Divines studiously keep the true reference of the term "hell fire"—"gehenna"—out of night. Says The Polymicrian Greek Lexion to the New Testament, "Gehenna, properly the valley of Hinnom, south of Jerusalem: once celebrated for the horrid worship of Moloch, and afterwards polluted with every species of filth, as well as the carcases of animals, and dead bodies of malefactors; to consume which, in order to avert the pestilence which such a mass of corruption would occasion, constant fires were kept burning."

Now, with such scenes and facts before our eyes, there could none, who heard our Lord speak of the end of the wicked, mistake his meaning. The impenitent and incorrigible sinner, like the filth about Jerusalem, and the dead bodies of animals and men, if not utterly consumed, would keep alive the plague in the universe; hence, they shall be "cast into Gehenna"—hell fire. Therefore, "fear him who is able to destroy both soul and body in Gehenna—hell."—Mat. x. 28. Just as certain as the filth about Jerusalem, and dead carcases were cast into the burning fire of the valley of Hinnom, and utterly consumed, just so certain will God destroy both soul and body—i. e., the entire being of the incorrigible sinner. That is the plain common sense meaning of our Lord's language; and he was in no danger of being misunderstood by those who heard him. And it remained for the corruptions of Papacy to bring up eternal torments in a state of consciousness; and it came into being, along with the doctrine of "immortal soul," which last mentioned doctrine has given birth to all the fooleries, tuperstitions, and blasphemies of the church of Rome. Luther, when he first came out against that corrupt church, as may be seen in his defence published in 1530, says— "I permit the Pope to make articles of faith for himself and his faithful; such as that he is Emperor of the world—King of heaven, and God upon earth—that the soul is immortal, with all those monstrous opinions to be found in the Roman dunghill of decretals."

Thus, in the first onset against "the mother of harlots," he laid "the axe at the root of the tree;" and had he not given way to the opposition of brother Reformers, papacy would have been "consumed" long ago. For, take away the doctrine that the soul out of Christ is immortal: and let the truth come to light, that "the dead know not anything," and you "eat the flesh" of "the mother of harlots and burn her with fire." She can't live in such a scorching sun. It strips her of her Virgin Mary—Peter—and all her saints, that she worships; and marks her as rank an idolator as the most stupid Hindoo. This is a self-evident truth. Just convince any man that no soul is immortal out of Christ,—that the dead are unconscious—and that our entire future existence depends on the resurrection of the dead, and he never can be a papist: the very fountain of papacy is dried up, and it is numbered among the things that "was and is not."

Why should Protestants, then, cling to doctrines the only use of which is to feed Papacy—convert men into infidels, and make universalists? or to send them after the strong delusion of "spirit rappings"? "The soul that sinneth it shall die." But, "to them, who by patient continuance in well-doing, seek for honor, and glory, and immortality, eternal life." "The dead know not anything;" but the dead in Christ shall rise again; this is certain, because God has promised it, and the demonstration of it is in the resurrection of our Lord Jesus Christ; but "if the dead rise not"—"then they also which are fallen asleep in Christ are perished." The Christian's hope, then, is in the resurrection of the dead at the advent of Christ: and the end of the wicked is, that "he shall perish forever, like his own dung."—Job xx. 7—that he shall "burn up, saith the Lord of Hosts," and be left "neither root" nor "branch;" yea, "utterly perish;" 2 Peter ii. 13. And "Babylon," the whole of her shall be "burned with fire;" and "that great city shall be thrown down, and shall be found no more at all."—Rev. xviii 8, 21.

Waiting on the Lord.

"They that wait on the Lord shall renew their strength. They shall mount up with wings as eagles; they shall run and not be weary; they shall walk and not faint." This passage from Isaiah rings like the blast of an Alpine horn. The phrase "to wait on God" implies a great deal more than mere patient passivity. There is a world of nerve in the Hebrew original. It primarily signifies to be strong—strong enough to endure. The word expresses durability, that quality of heart which is typified by a stout piece of oak which never bends or breaks under tremendous pressure. Thence the word came to signify patience as the opposite of despondency and fretfulness. In the text from Isaiah the phrase denotes a permanent habit of mind—a devout habit that loves to pray—a patient habit that submits to God's discipline—an obedient habit that ever says, "Speak, Lord! thy servant heareth"—a submissive habit that is ready to receive just what God sends, and to bear just what burthens of duty God may lay upon it. Waiting on the Lord is a grace; just as much as the grace of loving, or the grace of faith in Jesus Christ.

When I see a child on its mother's knee, with open mouth receiving such food as the mother chooses to give, I see a type of this grace; for the soul that waits on God is nourished by his living bread. When one of my baby-boys stretches out his arms for me to carry him on a walk, I see a type of this grace; for the soul that waits on God is carried by him over life's dark and dangerous places. When I see a docile pupil listening to her teacher's voice, I behold a type of the humble docility that sits down in God's school to be taught the hardest lessons of adversity, and the most precious revelations of divine love. When I once met a solder's wife waiting with her petition in Abraham Lincoln's ante-chamber, I there too saw a striking emblem of the confiding faith that waits on God in prayer, knowing how ready he is to grant the fullest blessing.

1. This grace hangs as heavily laden with promises as a Hamburgh vine with its generous clusters. In the first place, waiting on the Lord gives strength. Those who were spiritually weak grow strong; those who had some degree of strength grow stronger. When I go every summer to Saratoga, languid, weak and unstrung, I take my place by one of its tonic springs, and "wait" upon the bubbling waters until I find a new life creeping out through my ten fingers, until exertion becomes a perfect joy, and until I can mount a pulpit as a lark rises singing to its tree-top. All this vitality ran into me from that wonderful spring. Just such a well-spring to the soul is our heavenly Lord. He restores, he heals, he girds our weak will as with iron, he unstops our mouth to speak with tongue of fire; nay, we "can do all things through Christ which strengtheneth us." Here is the secret of the power of such spiritual giants as Elijah, Daniel, and Paul—of Luther, Knox, Bunyan, and Lyman Beecher. If we inquire where they got such emphasis of action, and such victory over the devil, we shall find that their power all lay in their constant waiting on the Lord. They were eminently men of prayer. They walked very close with God. They lived in the omnipotent element of his grace. They possessed the gift of the knees, and through a fervent wrestling in prayer, they drew down into their own souls the plentitude of strength which gave them the mastery. "I have so much to do," said Luther, "that I cannot get on with less than three hours a day in praying."

2. But not only does the man who waits on God renew his strength, he also gets INSPIRATION. He shall "mount up with wings as an eagle." Naturalists tell us that the special power of an eagle is in his wings. He can fly in the very teeth of a gale, and after playing the æronaut for many long hours, he wheels down from the clouds, unwearied to his mountain nest. His "conversation is in the heavens." Bats haunt the caverns, wrens flit about among garden-shrubs, and owls hoot from midnight forests; but eagles are children of the skies and playmates of the storm.

So God means that every soul which waits on him should soar. Not creep—not burrow in the muck and mire of worldliness; not crouch in abject submission as the slaves of men or Satan—but soar. When a soul binds itself to God, and lives a life of holy consecration, it is enabled to take wings and dwell in the atmosphere of heaven. He catches inspiration. He rises to the best thoughts, gains a wide outlook, and reaches to a companionship with the glorified. He outflies the petty vexations and low groveling desire that drag earthly souls down into the mire. His soul-life is hid with Christ in God. What to him are the fears of man, the greed for rusting lucre, the hunger for applause, the fear of poverty, or the dread of death itself? Why should he chafe and fret his spirit with the petty worries and anxieties of the worldling? What cares the eagle, as he bathes his wing in the translucent gold of the upper sky, for all the turmoil, the racket, the clouds, or the lighteniugs that play far beneath him? He flies in company with the sun! So a heaven-bound soul flies in company with God!

You may do this, my brother, if you will but wait on God; if you will but knit your inner life to Jesus. You will be amazed at the power of such a religion to lift you up, to carry you clear of low, base, sensual desires; to inspire sweet, pure, holy meditations; to enkindle joy in the darkest seasons of affliction, and to keep you serene and shining as the stars. Try it. Try more prayer. Try more to live with God. Set your affections on things above, and fasten your heart-treasures in heaven. So shall waiting on the Lord renew your strength. You will mount up with wings as eagles; you shall run and not grow weary, you shall walk and not faint.—Theo. Cuyler.

Sight and Faith.

"Conceive" says Dr. Chalmers, "a man to be standing on the margin of this green world; and that, when he looked towards it, he saw abundance smiling upon every field, and all the blessings which earth can afford scattered in profusion throughout every family, and the light of the sun sweetly resting upon all the pleasant habitations, and the joys of human companionship brightening many a happy circle of society; conceive this to be the general character of the scene upon one side of his contemplation, and then on the other, beyond the verge of the goodly planet on which he was situated, he could descry nothing but a dark and fathomless unknown. Think you that he would bid a voluntary adieu to all the brightness and all the beauty that were before him upon the earth, and commit himself to the frightful solitude away from it? Would he leave its peopled dwelling places, and become a solitary wanderer through the fields of nonentity? If space afford him nothing but a wilderness, would he for it abandon the homebred scenes of life and of cheerfulness that lay so near, and exerted such a power of urgency to detain him? Would he not cling to the region of sense, and of life, and of society? and, shrinking away from the desolation that was beyond it, would not he be glad to keep his firm footing on the territory of this world, and to take shelter under the silver canopy stretched over it?

"But if, during the time of his contemplation, some happy island of the blest had floated by, and there had burst upon his senses the light of its surpassing glories and its sounds of sweeter melody, and he clearly saw that thus a purer beauty rested upon every field, and a purer heartfelt joy spread itself among all the families, and he could discern there a peace, and a piety, and a benevolence, which put a moral gladness into every bosom, and united the whole society in one rejoicing sympathy with each other, and with the beneficent Father of them all;—could he further see that pain and mortality were there unknown, and above all, that signals of welcome were hung out, and an avenue of communication was made for him—perceive you not that what was before the wilderness would become the land of invitation, and that now the world would be the wilderness? What unpeopled space could not do, can be done by space teeming with beatific scenes and beatific society. And let the existing tendencies of the heart be what they may to the scenes that are near and visible around us, still if another stood revealed to the prospect of man, either through the channel of faith or through the channel of his senses, then without violence done to the constitution of his moral nature, may he die unto the present world, and live to the loveliest world that stands in the distance away from it!"

Gehazi: or Covetousness.

The first mention of Gehazi, is when the good Shunamite prepared a place for the prophet and his servant. He did his master's bidding in those days very well, when there was no great temptation before him.

He took the staff, and laid it upon the dead child, but it was not revived until the prophet came. Although Gehazi was so near the prophet, and witnessed his devotion to God, yet he had secret hindrances in his own heart, so that he was not in the way to become a prophet—a man of God. He had great advantages in beholding the power of God with Elisha, but he was not obedient to the clear, and holy light. The pure disinterestedness of the prophet in doing good, does not seem to have impressed him with a desire to do likewise. Good example is so lost sometimes, that it is not understood. The prophet was absorbed in the honor and glory of God; he desired that the God of Israel should be known, and feared, and exerted the power of his office, with an eye single to him, who had peculiarly commissioned him, when he was about to remove his faithful servant Elijah, who had so wonderfully maintained divine right over the priests of Baal, and had Gehazi been the right man in secret integrity before God, he might have succeeded his master Elisha. No doubt he had the opportunity of attaining that honor.

We cannot always judge about people's responsibility, by their position. We would say, who so fit to be trusted, as the servant of the prophet? The secret to be questioned, is he sincere and true—does the outward call have the inward acceptance? Goodness in this world has more, or less, of cross and trial in its exercise; for compensation does not always attend honesty and truth immediately. Every life comes to a time of test—the good, and the bad—the good to be made better, and the bad to be made worse.

In the lesser incidents of the prophet's intercourse with the people, Gehazi no doubt was a faithful servant—and if otherwise, the prophet bore with him in silence.

But when Naaman the Syrian came in his incurable disease to be healed, the prophet burned with the holy desire to let the heathen nobleman know, that there was a God in Israel, and he was his representative; this was the glory and honor which filled his heart, which the possession of gold or silver could not inspire. Again, it was renewed to Elisha, that the mantle of Elijah rested upon him—the joy of the Lord filled his heart, and the great man's offer of reward, was in his sight, only, "a mule's burden of earth."

It was not the time to receive the gifts the prophet named—the great thing was, that this honorable man should return to his master, the King of Syria, and declare that the God of Israel still lived, and his prophet was there. These glorious thoughts filled the prophet's mind, while the covetous Gehazi was in a very different train of thoughts, how he should accomplish the desire, for this exposed gift; that he might possess simply, what his master had declined—he could not bear to let this chance of gain pass him—the covetous thought cherished a moment, soon brought forth the act. He hailed the expedient just to follow Naaman, and accept a gift, with a lie to plead for it, that his master had two guests suddenly come, and he was not provided for their entertainment. Poor Gehazi, he thought he had admirably succeeded, as the two servants of Naaman laid down their burden of raiment and shekels of silver in the tower—he made a good bargain, as he smiled upon the success in gaining this treasure—but he received more than he had reckoned for—the servants left for Gehazi their master's disease, which he had washed away in the Jordan. He had compromised his master's honor, and lied unto God, and was black in sin for that pitiful treasure. Ah, covetousness is a long chain of iniquity, and reaches to its own reward.

When he came before his master, Elisha said unto him, "Whence comest thou, Gehazi?" And he said, "thy servant went no whither." But the secret of the Lord was with Elisha, and he said, "Went not my heart with thee, when the man turned again from his chariot to meet thee? Is it a time to receive money, and to receive garments, and olive-yards, and vineyards, and sheep and oxen, and men-servents and maid-servents?"

He did not give his poor servant a long lecture upon the sins of covetousness and avarice, but in the majesty of God's prophet said, "The leprosy therefore of Naaman shall cleave unto thee, and unto thy seed for ever."

"And he went out from his presence a leper as white as snow." Thus poor Gehazi bemoaned himself a covetous leper until his dying day. "Be sure your sin will find you out." Israelite Indeed.

The Jews of the Holy Land.

Jerusalem, July 15, 1864.

"I cannot leave the Holy City, now visited by me the third time, and in which I have now been staying a fortnight, without furnishing you with some particulars which may, perhaps, have some interest for your readers. Permit me to begin by pointing out to you a veritable amelioration since the last ten years—viz: since the day when we had the happiness to found the Mayer Rothschild Hospital—an establishment which according to the statements of the Prince of Wales, M. Renan and all travelers, has no equal in the whole East, and is nowhere surpassed in point of food, cleanliness, and the spirit of charity which presides in this institution, and which is everywhere useful but here indispensable. It is a true school of civilization; please to observe that besides eighteen beds always occupied, six thousand patients are annually attended to, receiving here every necessary help. Among these are Christians of every denomination, as well as Moslems, and naturally also Jews from Kurdistan, Bokhara, Persia, India, Bagdad, Samarkand and all European and African countries: and Dr. Rothziegel, late second physician in the great hospital of Vienna as well as his worthy spouse, discharge here with probity and great delicacy a high and laborious mission. It is thence and from the industrial school, from which have issued within the last ten years 150 workmen that have proceeded all the elements which constitute the amelioration in the condition of the population; the young people are reckoning it as an honor not to be comprised among those who receive charity, as far as Alexandria, Beyrout, and even Constantinople, and belong to the workmen of our establishment. The houses of refuge arising from a bequest of the late Judah Touro, are outside the city, giving shelter to forty families, and will, as soon as the funds shall be forthcoming, give shelter to two hundred families. The Jewish population, undoubtedly at present in Jerusalem, exceeds 9,000, and in all Palestine, 20,000 souls. Besides Poland, it is Morocco and Tunis which have within late years furnished the largest contingent of immigrants. A commercial movement, powerful in the ports of Jaffa and Chaiffa, has attracted a considerable number of Jewish families, who have opened warehouses and other establishments. The real causes of this trade are, the planting of cotton, which I have seen in the plain of Sharon; the creation of the Port-Said which draws most of its provisions from the coast of Syria, and the piercing of the isthmus of Suez.

"The opening of a European and French school for the girls does not meet with the least opposition, and shows that a true spirit of religious civilization begins to reign in the Holy City.

"Some remains of intolerance which still weighed on our co-religionists are disappearing before a true spirit of tolerance. Thus Yzzeth Pasha, Governor General of Jerusalem, has kindly promised me to extend his protecting hand to everything affecting our institutions, and in general the condition of our brethren. He apoligised for not having as yet been able to do everything, stating that it was necessary before all to consult the general feeling of the population and its wants; that he was little supported by the subordinate officials, but that everything was in a fair way of formation. Father Carlotti, of Coeldi, Vicar of the Holy Land and apostolic plenipotentiary of Jerusalem, has been pleased spontaneously to give orders in the presence of our consul, M. de Bouers, that our brethren should not be molested in the neighboring streets of the church of the Holy Sepulchre; the children were in the habit of throwing stones at the Jews who passed. To test these good intentions, M. Altras and myself went in full daylight, at 10 o'clock in the morning, to the church of the Holy Sepulchre. A very hopeful feeling of honor is arising, and should we one day succeed in making of this patriarchal city a centre of religious studies, a kind of Israelitish university for the East and the adjoining countries, many obstacles would be removed, and we should have raised a worthy monument to the noble spirit of our age; we should have replaced a pauperism by the repayment of a debt, by creating establishments which will procure a livelihood to those attaching themselves to them, and this while diffusing sound knowledge based on the religious sentiment. No Resurrection for the Ungodly.

Paul says: "That which thou sowest, thou sowest not that body which shall be, but bare grain, it may chance of wheat, or of some other grain: but God giveth it a body as it hath pleased him, and to every seed his own body." 1 Cor. xv. 37, 38. Translation is to change the living saints at Christ's coming from a mortal state to an immortal, without a passage through death; and resurrection is to restore the dead saints as vegetation springs from the earth. If Adam and Eve had formed a worthy character by obedience to the laws of God they would have been translated like Enoch.

My life for 75 years past greatly surprises me. To think how the traditions of men have led me; traditions all in plain contradiction to the letter of the Bible. 1st. The immortal soul. 2d. Eternal misery the penalty of God's law against sin. 3d. Of necessity I had to believe that the wicked would have a resurrection and a second death, or loose my excellent creed before mentioned. Now we will see how this agrees with the words of Christ. "He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life; but he that believeth not the Son shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on him." He cannot rise. John iii. 36. "Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you: he that eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood hath eternal life, and I will raise him up at the last day." John vi. 53, 54. Christ makes moral character the test of resurrection.

The Wages of Sin.

This is so plain in Scripture, and is so every where inculcated,—that the wages of sin is death, and the reward of the righteous is everlasting life,—the constant language of the Scripture in the current of the New Testament as well as Old, is life to the just, to believers, to the obedient, and death to the wicked and unbelievers,—that one would wonder how the readers could be mistaken where death is threatened so constantly, and declared every where to be the ultimate punishment and last estate to which the wicked must all come. To solve this, they have invented a very odd signification of the word death, which they would have stand for eternal life in torment. They who will put so strange and contrary a signification upon a word in a hundred places, where, if it had not its true and literal sense, one would wonder it should be so often used, and that in opposition to life, which in those places is used literally, ought to have good proofs for giving it a sense in those places of Scripture directly contrary to what it ordinarily has in other parts of Scripture and every where else.—John Locke.

God's National Plan.—A Proposition.

Ever since the republication of the articles on the above-named subject in book or pamphlet form was suggested, the necessity for the work has grown stronger and stronger in the writer's mind. It must be done. The Christians of this nation should be fully informed on this subject, and we are determined to do our duty in the premises.

After some thought, we have concluded that a republication of the work in book form will be unsatisfactory, for the reason that it must of necessity be incomplete. It would be unreasonable to suppose that the first superficial glance into such a vast subject exhausts it. In the nature of the case, the evidence will increase every day, compelling a change in details already announced, and opening a wider field to reflection and investigation. Some very important new points have attracted our attention since we wrote our articles, some of which we have noticed in the Herald.

We now have a proposition to make. The writer proposes to publish a magazine, to appear we will say, every three months, or as often as funds will allow, in which he will republish all that has hitherto come to light on the subject mentioned, and all that shall hereafter be discovered. In this way the subscribers will have the satisfaction of being constantly posted on one of the grandest themes of this wonderful and startling epoch. We want to get the magazine up in good style, so that it may be bound by those who prefer to keep it thus.

In pursuing the suggested course, we have another object in view. The Herald of Life contains a great deal of matter, interesting for the moment, but evanescent. It also contains some things which we all feel like saving, (Biblical criticisms, &c.) and saving too in a form that is convenient and suitable. There should be a standing repository for all such matter. "Gather up the fragments that nothing be lost." The proposed periodical would supply our lack in this particular,

While accomplishing these desired ends, the magazine would furnish a place for the discussion of questions that merit a more thorough and deliberate investigation than is practicable in a weekly periodical.

The writer's mind is fully made up for the accomplishment of this project, but it will perhaps depend on the encouragement he receives how soon the first number will be published. We should like to start it by October. Each number may be stereotyped, so that it can be scattered as widely as the demand may extend. All thinkers who believe in another age of mercy to mortals, and who believe in the unimpaired integrity of God's covenanted relation to Israel in the flesh, and who are in favor of searching for truth, should be interested in a work like this. Those who wish to take the first number will please let us know. The price will be announced hereafter, as the exact size and expense of the magazine is to be determined. We propose to make it a Library of useful matter. Shall our proposition be carried out?

The Flag and the Cross.—In the Senate of the United States, in the year 1862, Mr. Johnson, now president of the United States, gave expression to the following sentiments: "But let us go on; let us encourage the army and navy; let us vote the men and the means necessary to vitalize and bring into requisition the enforcing and coercive power of the government: let us crush out the rebellion, and anxiously look forward to the day—God grant it may come soon—when that baleful comet of fire and blood which now hovers over this distracted people may be chased away by the benignant star of peace. Let us look forward to the time when we can take the flag, that glorious flag of our country, and nail it below the cross, and there let wave as it waved in the olden time, and let us gather around it, and inscribe as our motto, 'Liberty and Union, one and inseperable, now and forever.' Let us gather around it, and while it hangs floating beneath the cross, let us exclaim, 'Christ first, our country next.' Oh, how greatly rejoiced I should be to see the dove returning to the ark with the olive leaf indicating that land was found, and that the mighty waters had abated. I trust the time will soon come when we can do as they did in olden times, when the stars sang together in the morning, and all creation proclaimed the glory of God. Then let us do our duty in the Senate and in the councils of the nation, and thereby stimulate our brave officers and soldiers to do theirs in the field."

As kindled brands, if left to themselves separately, would be soon extinct; but, when thrown together, burst into a blaze, so is every feeling heightened immeasurably in ardour by the union of men in parties.—Whately.

APPOINTMENTS.

Joseph T. Curry will preach in Kast Hall, Boston, June 18 and 25.

Responsibilities.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. He often differs from them; but believes in a free exchange of thoughts. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not: he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

Our Israelitish Origin.—A work on Prophecy. It was written by Prof. Wilson, England, some years since. We republished it, believing it could not fail to interest all thinking men, whatever might be thought of the accuracy of its positions. For ourself, we indorse the general theory that the Anglo-Saxons are the literal descendants of Israel, in the line of Joseph and Ephraim. Price, 50 cents, in paper covers only. Postage 6 cents.

The Life & Advent Union.

Constitution of "The Life and Advent Union."

Article I. The object of this Union is to use all available means to promulgate the doctrine of Life only in Christ, the personal, proximate advent of our Lord Jesus, and all sentiments calculated to spread vital godliness.

II. Any person believing in Life through Christ alone, (thereby denying any future life to unbelievers,) and sustaining a Christian character, may become a member of this Union by subscribing to the Constitution.

III. The officers of this Union shall be a President, Vice President, Secretary, Treasurer, and seventeen Directors, who together shall constitute the Managing Board, and who are to be elected annually.

IV. The Managers shall be authorized to collect funds for the Union, which funds shall be transmitted to the Business Agent, who shall keep account of the same and transfer them to the Treasurer.

V. The Members of the Board of Directors shall constitute a Committee in their several districts to transact all business pertaining to the Union in their several localities.

VI. The Annual meeting and such other meetings as may be deemed necessary by the Board of Managers, shall be called by giving three weeks' notice.

VII. The Secretary shall keep a record of the names and post-office addresses of the members.

VIII. This Constitution may be amended by a two-thirds vote at any Annual meeting.

Note.—This organization is in no sense a Church. It is simply a Union for the specific purpose of issuing, through the use of the press, such periodicals and other works as shall spread what we regard the truth of God. All persons are welcome to work with us, even though they differ from us in their views on some points: but the Union, by the 2nd Article, intended to guard against being thwarted in their design by votes of persons adverse to its object.—Ed. of Her.

Books and Pamphlets

FOR SALE AT THIS OFFICE.

On all books and pamphlets sent by mail the postage has to be pre-paid.

Six Sermons on the inquiry, Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the Life-giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by Geo. Storrs; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This word contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in plain binding, 50 cents; in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near ten years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

The Watch Tower: or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead, can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none there fore fail to read this pamphlet.

Life from the Dead; or, The Righteous only will live again. By Geo. Storrs. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

Life only in Christ.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Editor of the Herald of Life. Price, $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

Man's Destiny.—Immortality: The Argument from Nature and Scripture, by Rev, T. M. Post, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by Geo. Storrs. Price, in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a Essay on Immortality, for which a gentleman New York paid $150. It was intended to have the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men, with ut egard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The Reviewer followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The Author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

Bible vs. Tradition: in which the True Teaching of the Bible is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity Life, Death, &c. Price, bound, $1. Postage 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. It is a work of much labor and research. The title indicates its object, and the performance shows the object was kept in view throughout. The language is sometimes severe on what is called "orthodoxy—more so than is desirable—but the value of the work, in general, cannot be over-estimated. Thousands of it have been sent abroad, and thousand more ought to be scattered. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subjects; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

Poetry.

THE NATION'S JUBILEE.

BY MRS. S. A. COLVIN.

A Hymn of rejoicing, especially adapted to the celebration of peace.

Hark! what joyous peals we hear,
Hill and vale resounding;
Gladsome notes salute each ear,
Every heart's rebounding;
Smiles on every face we see,
All unite in harmony,
'Tis our nation's jubilee,
Glory, Hallelujah.

Lo! the morn of peace has come;
Glory, Hallelujah:
Let the joyful tidings run;
Glory, Hallelujah:
Rocks and hills your silence break;
Nature every where awake;
Come and in our joys partake;
Glory, Hallelujah.

Four long weary years have past;
Years of bitter wailing;
Woe upon our land was cast;
Grief each heart assailing;
Now the darksome night is o'er;
Fear we not the war cry more!
Peace doth reign upon our shore;
Glory, Hallelujah.

We have set the captive free;
Glory, Hallelujah:
Join they in our jubilee;
Glory, Hallelujah:
We have bound the monster fast,
Cause of all our woe; 'tis past;
Right and justice reign at last;
Glory, Hallelujah;

Powerless is the traitor's arm;
Glory, Hallelujah:
They can us no longer harm;
Glory, Hallelujah:
Long and bitter was their reign,
To our country's grief and shame;
We are free; rejoice again;
Glory, Hallelujah.

Oh! the blood this boon has cost;
Oh! the tears of sadness;
We rejoice it is not lost;
Grief has turned to gladness,
For the blood of patriots shed—
For our loved and martyred dead—
Glory's rising from their bed;
Glory, Hallelujah.

Fell by the assassin's hand
From his lofty station,
He, the noblest of our land,
Ruler of our nation;
Stroke that filled our land with gloom,
But uniting o'er his tomb,
Justice sealed the traitors doom;
Glory, Hallelujah,

God allowed this stroke to fall
For a signal blessing;
To unite us, one and all,
Through this grief distressing;
From our loved and martyred slain,
Came a sterner voice amain,
Cleanse the land from slavery's stain;
And secure thy freedom.

Gladly we that voice obey,
And no longer dally;
With its poisonous breath away,
Sons of freedom rally.
Death to traitors, one and all,
Let them in their own pits fall:
Shout, JEHOVAH reigns o'er all,
Glory, Hallelujah.

Raise again the joyful shout,
Glory, Hallelujah:
Let the gladsome peals ring out,
Glory, Hallelujah:
Praise the Lord, our land is free
From the curse of slavery;
'Tis our nation's jubilee:
Glory, Hallelujah.

THE TURNING OF THE LEAF.

"Now that the war is over," said William, "I should like to know, for my part, what has been gained by all the fighting."

"Why," replied Susie, his sister, who liked to say witty things even on the most serious subjects, "Cousin Primly has got a commission, and Mr. Shoddy has got rich, and Tom Noddy has got a wooden leg, which they say he can skate and dance with, and the Rebels have got whipped! But, really," said she, "I should like to understand a great deal better than I do what the fighting was for, what brought it about, and all that; and I wish Uncle Rodman would tell us."

Thus appealed to, Uncle Rodman laid his newspaper on the table, placed his old silver-bowed spectacles upon it, crossed his legs, put his fingers together, looked contemplative, as if putting his thoughts together at the same time, and finally addressed the young folks of the household in this manner.

"I am very glad to hear you express a wish to know more about the conflict that is now closing. It has been the great event of the century, and you ought to have a clear general idea of its origin and results. You were quite young when it began, for that was four years ago; and it was not to be expected that you should then understand what so many grown people failed to appreciate. But you are older now, and the terrible meaning of the war is clearer to us all than then.

"In a word, children, slavery was the cause of the war; and God permitted the war in order that slavery might be destroyed."

"That's it, in a nutshell!" cried Susie.

"Whom the gods would destroy, they first make mad," quoted William, from some book he had been studying.

"That is true," said Uncle Rodman; "and it would really seem that slavery had been made insane in order that it might rush to its own destruction. The rebellion was a stupendous piece of folly, as well as stupendous wickedness.

"Mr. Lincoln, and the people who elected him, had no wish to interfere with the 'peculiar institution', as it was called, in the States where it existed four years ago. Unjust and unwise as it was to keep human beings in bondage, they did not feel that the law gave them any right to take the slaves away from their masters by force. Many of us would have been glad to convince the South that it would have been better for both slaves and masters—far better for the Slave States themselves, and for the whole country—that all men, women, and children should be free. But that was a truth which the South would not tolerate, and those who attempted to teach it there—even those who were suspected of believing it—met with the worst treatment; for even hanging was considered too good for an Abolitionist. Indeed, slaveholders and slave hunters became so violent, unreasonable, and wicked in their opposition to all who thought slavery wrong, in their hatred of free institutions, and in their attempts to carry slavery into new States, and to catch their slaves wherever they could be found in the old Free States, that a few believed, with John Brown, that it was right to resist force with force, and go with arms to rescue the negroes from the hands of their masters.

"But the most the Northern people expected to do, when they made Abraham Lincoln President, was to keep slavery out of the new States that were coming into the Union. That the Southern leaders knew. But they could not submit to any such decrease of their power. Accustomed to ruling their slaves—accustomed, too, for many years, to ruling the nation—they had grown arrogant, conceited, overbearing; they would not abide by the decision of the ballot-box, which had made Mr. Lincoln President; so they determined to destroy the government they could not control. They seceded—declared their States independent of the old Union, and formed a new 'Confederacy,' with slavery as its 'corner stone.'

"Even then we had no thought of making war upon them. The North would never have made war upon the South. We did not believe in war; but thought that all our troubles should be settled peaceably by the ballot-box, and according to the Constitution. But the rebel leaders, proud, ambitious, confident that they could override Northern freemen as they had so long overridden their black slaves, recklessly, and most forcibly indeed, made war against us. They seized forts, arsenals, and navy-yards, which belonged solely to the United States. Fort Sumter, in Charleston Harbor, did not belong to South Carolina, but was the property of the United States government; this the rebels opened fire upon, on the 12th of April, 1861, and compelled its surrender. Major Anderson hauled down the stars and stripes, and marched out with his little garrison. The whole South was jubilant. They thought they had done a wonderful thing. They were going to have Washington then, and call the roll of their slaves in a very little while on Bunker Hill. Of course, the North could not resist them! Of course, we were too cowardly to fight Southern gentlemen! For they had come to believe that the slave-owning classes were the only chivalrous and courageous people on this continent.

"I said, 'the whole South.' But, besides the leading rebels, and the ignorant masses, deceived and misled by them, there was a large class of loyal Unionists in the South, who loved the old government, and opposed secession. How many of these noble men and women suffered and died, or became fugitives from their homes, rather than join the rebel cause! If only for their sakes, it was our duty to preserve the dear old Union they loved, and not permit them to be made citizens of a new Confederacy against their will. To this class belonged Andrew Johnson, our new President—a Southern man, who stood up manfully for the nation in his own State of Tennessee; who knows all the perfidity, cruelty, and craft of the traitors, and will, I trust, know equally well how to deal with them.

"Well, the rebels took up arms and attacked us; and there was nothing left for us to do, if we would preserve our rights, our self-respect, and the respect of the world, but to fight in self-defence. Everything was at stake—our existence as a nation, freedom, and the brightest blessings of civilization; for the slave power that would have subjugated us belongs to the dark ages. Children, there are two principles at work in the world: one is that of liberty and love to all men; the other is that of force, and the tyranny of the strong over the weak. We have been struggling here in America to develop the first principle; and if now we had tamely surrendered to the slave-power, which represents the other principle, how terrible, how disgraceful it would have been!"

"For my part," cried William, "I am glad we didn't do anything so mean as to submit to the old traitors! Why, Susie, only think of it! the rebels hated free schools—they wanted every man that works for a living kept ignorant, just like their slaves! They called us mud-sills, greasy mechanics, and all that, and said one Southern gentleman could whip five of us."

"I am so glad we didn't give up to them!" said Susie. "I feel just as I do when I have been reading a long, sad story, where there are bad men and women, and they have every thing their own way at first, and you think nothing can stop them, and you are so angry with them, and so sorry for the good people they treat so; but by and by something happens, and its so nice to have them finally caught in their own trap and punished! It makes me feel glad clear through!"

"Well, it has turned out so with the rebels. They have been caught in their own trap, most miserably. And slavery, for which they made the war, has been ground to dust between the two millstones. They have tried every means, and failed. They tried treason, they tried war, and at last they tried assassination, which is as much worse than open war as that is worse than peaceful measures in a bad cause. They failed in everything. Freedom has triumphed. The great evil of slavery has been swept away, and we have shown that a republican government, based upon the equal rights of all, is the best, the noblest, the strongest government in the world."

"O, it seems to me that killing President Lincoln was the worst thing I ever heard or read of in any history!" exclaimed Susie.

"My dear, you are right," said Uncle Rodman. "Even the assassination of a bad ruler is bad enough; but he was perhaps the most humane and forbearing ruler, as well as one of the kindest hearted men, that ever lived."

"What fools the rebels were," said William; "for everybody says he was their best friend."

"I believe that, children; for it was not in his nature to hate anybody, or to be actuated by feelings of vengeance. But the rebellion has stood on its two legs of folly and crime from the first. It was a great folly and a great crime to make war upon the government, to begin with. It was a great folly and a great crime to attempt to cut off the head of the nation by murder, to end with. And what horrors of folly and crime have walked between!

"But the slave-power, that brought on the war, and shed the blood of our brothers, and starved them in loathsome prisons, and inspired the last unparalleled atrocity—that power has been destroyed by its own mad ambition. Now we turn over a new leaf of history. Now we shall have peace founded on justice. So much we have gained; and is it not worth the cost? When I look at the future of America, I am dazzled by the glorious prospect. No more war; no human bondage; liberty and love for all, a reality then; a great and powerful nation—the greatest and most powerful the world has ever known setting aside forever the old barbarous rule of force, and living up to the golden rule of doing to others as we would be done by!

"A new page in human history indeed, that will be, children; and let us now begin and live worthy of that future. You, especially, who are young, belong to the new era of justice and human brotherhood; and O, let the fact inspire you now and henceforth with high aspirations, noble motives, and all generous thoughts and hopes!"

So saying, Uncle Rodman put on his spectacles, and took up his newspaper again, while the children sat seriously pondering what he had said.—"Our Young Folks" for June.

THE APOCALYPSE.

We think that the time-theorists of the present day make one fatal mistake in their interpretation of this book. We refer to their assumption that the 1260 days of ch. xi. 3, xii. 6; the time, times, and a-half of ch. xii. 14, and the forty-two months of ch. xiii. 5, each and all mean 1260 years. That such a long period is taken up in fulfilling the prophecy anterior to the coming of Christ, appears to us exceedingly suspicious; especially in view of certain significant expressions at the beginning and conclusion of the book. It appears that God gave this Apocalypse or Revelation to Jesus Christ "to show unto his servants things which must shortly come to pass." And at the conclusion of the vision Jesus thrice affirmed that he would "come quickly." And the third verse of the first chapter says: "Blessed is he that readeth, and they that hear the words of this prophecy, and keep in mind those things which are written therein: for the time is at hand." Can we believe that at least 1260 years have already been occupied in the development of the things written in the book? Would not the fact, if it were a fact, contradict the positive words of Christ "Surely I come quickly?" Did he mean "Surely I come in 1260 years?" or "Surely I come in 1800 years?" It cannot be.

But some one may say, "If you do not allow this intervention of eighteen centuries between the beginning and the conclusion of the fulfilment of the prophecy, pray what do you with the foregoing plain declarations concerning the immediateness of the Advent? If these things were 'shortly' to take place, and if the time was 'at hand' when the revelation was given, the entire book must be in the past." We answer that this theory is equally obnoxious to reason, although Prof. Stuart and other eminent scholars have endorsed it.

Our view is simply this: The Apocalypse of the future was not intended for, nor adapted to the church in the past. They had no more to do with it than they had to do with Christ's statements concerning the phenomena that would directly precede his Second Coming. The book was not understood in that day. It was sealed up like some of the prophecy of Daniel "to the time of the end." It belongs to no other time: and this explains the mystery that has enshrouded it down to our days. The blessing upon those who read and hear the words of this prophecy and keep in mind the things that are therein written cannot apply to any period in the past, while as yet it was utterly mysterious. But when the book begins to be fulfilled, and clearly understood, then "blessed is he that readeth;" then "blessed are they that hear the words of this prophecy and keep in mind the things which are therein written;" for then the time of Christ's advent is at hand. Then we may give earnest heed to the thrice-repeated declaration of our Lord "Surely I come quickly." This, we are persuaded, is the only true interpretation of the quoted statements. We take the position that whenever we are certain that any part of the Apocalypse, from its opening in the fourth chapter to its conclusion, is fulfilled, then we may know that Christ's Advent is "at hand," and that he will "come quickly." And this position necessarily involves another, that all the events from ch. iv. i. to ch. xx. i. come to pass in a short period of time. The theory that the 1260 days of the Apocalypse represent years appears to us simply impossible. "The things must shortly (speedily, quickly) come to pass," "for the time (of Christ's Advent) is at hand." There is no room for 1260 or 1800 years here. It is exceedingly probable that all the events within the indicated limits will be crowded into seven years of time. We make this statement not because we believe in any definite time, but merely to indicate our idea of what is meant by the adverbs "shortly," "quickly" and "at hand."

The question now is, Have we any reason to believe that we are in the vicinity of the fulfilment of the predicted things? We believe that we have. We are satisfied in our own minds that Rev. xiii. 18 is already unsealed. In our late remarks on the "Emperor's Book" the facts were represented. The first great clue to the Apocalypse is given us in the remarkable and wonderful circumstances connected with the Napoleonic Dynasty. We have now to remember the admonition: "Blessed is he that readeth, and they that hear the words of this prophecy, and keep in mind those things which are written therein: for the time is AT HAND." "He that testifieth these things saith, SURELY I COME QUICKLY. Amen. Come, Lord Jesus." J. T. C.

THE HOPE OF THE FUTURE.

[Concluded from No. 33.]

The Apostle desired to be present with the Lord, not as a disembodied soul, for he says, "not for that we would be unclothed;" and hence, in harmony with this desire, he says, "in this we groan earnestly, desiring to be clothed upon with our house which is from heaven;" and, therefore, since this clothing upon, or re-creation of the human nature cannot take place till the resurrection, "when this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal shall have put on immortality,"—his desire to be absent from the body and to be present with the Lord, cannot be gratified, and he evidently did not expect it, from his reasoning, until the dead in Christ shall rise.

So far, then, from inculcating the doctrine that at death the soul of the believer is present with the Lord, this text forms part of an important passage in the Apostle's writings, in which he exhibits an utter disregard of such a doctrine, and declares that his own earnest longing was for the day of resurrection; when being absent from the body—that is, having parted forever with his mortality—he should possess his new immortal nature, in which he should behold, and be forever present with the Lord.

I leave, then, the teacher of the popular doctrine to explain this remarkable fact, that here (as in the two places which we have previously considered,) the Apostle says nothing of the blissful interval between death and resurrection—expresses no desire in reference to this interval; but as if impatient of it, he groans and earnestly desires to be clothed upon with his "house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens." The conclusion is unavoidable, that the Apostle Paul knew of no such a state of intermediate blessedness for the soul: the consummation of his wishes is thus expressed—"if by any means I might attain unto the resurrection of the dead."—(Phil. iii. 11.)

Some, in their determination not to yield this, the citadel of their favorite dogma, endeavor to make something plausible of it by what is termed riding a metaphor to death. The figurative expression, "clothed upon," and "at home in," and "absent from the body," it is alleged, must signify something distinct from the clothing and the body. That which is clothed upon, and which is at home in or absent from the body, is the immortal soul. Now this looks very specious; but admit it for the sake of argument, and it is obvious what a strange and unmeaning confusion of language the whole of this part of the chapter exhibits. Paul sets out with expressing the strong confidence which he and believers generally had in their triumph over mortality when they should receive their building of God—their spiritual body—their new condition of future life—which he had shown in the first epistle, will be bestowed at the resurrection. Groaning under the burden of a present mortality, he earnestly desires that the time may soon arrive when, possessed of his spiritual body, "mortality shall be swallowed up of life." Until this clothing upon, —that is, until the resurrection,—it is obvious that mortality reigns,—it is not swallowed up of life. But how does this instruction of Paul's agree with the popular belief that the immortal soul at death escapes from its prison-house of clay, and that at this moment

"There is a land of pure delight,
Where saints immortal reign"?

The Apostle is evidently at variance with the modern theology on this point, when he teaches that not until we are "created in Christ Jesus,"—invested with our spiritual body,—clothed upon by our building of God,—the grand result is accomplished, mortality is swallowed up of life.

Besides, on the supposition that the being absent from the body and present with the Lord, refers to the immortal soul leaving its corporeal abode and ascending to God, how I ask, does this statement follow as an inference from what the Apostle had been previously discoursing upon? Why does he preface it by a term which shows that it stands connected with the foregoing observations as a consequence, and say, "Therefore, we are always confident," &c? The substance of Paul's statement is that he earnestly desired the arrival of resurrection, that he might be possessed of his spiritual and immortal nature. What logical connection is there between this emphatic desire, and the statement, that, when he died, his disembodied soul ascended to the presence of God? According to the exposition given above, the connection is obvious and natural; but such an exposition of the passage, the only possible one as it appears to me, gives a most decided contradiction to the doctrine which is so fondly and furtively reared upon it.

But further, if we are to understand that apparent something which is clothed upon to be the spiritual nature or soul, then the Apostle plainly avows that he had no desire for this intermediate state; for he says, "Not for that we would be unclothed." Even with this gloss, his longing is for the redemption of the body at resurrection. Let it be noted, that according to this exposition, Paul does not pass over in silence the popular notion of an intermediate state of bliss, as in the true exposition of the passage as given above, he is made to affirm that he would rather not participate in it; he does not desire disembodied bliss,—"Not that he would be unclothed, but clothed upon, that mortality might be swallowed up of life."

Once more, if it be affirmed that the imagery of being clothed upon represents the popular notion of the soul as something within which is clothed upon with its earthly house or building of God, then consistency demands that the doctrine of the soul's incorruptibility and immortality be forthwith discarded from the orthodox belief; for it is written "This corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality." This something within,—the soul, must put on incoruption and immortality, and is itself called "this corruptible, and this mortal." "So when this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal shall have put on immortality, then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written—Death is swallowed up in victory."

The attempt to evade the proper meaning of the Apostle's language, does but involve the disconcerted polemic in greater perplexities, and in the end lead to his being entangled and taken in his own net. Candor must compel the acknowledgement that the very prevalent custom of quoting this text of Paul's for the purpose of teaching that he expected to be with Christ immediately at death, is most unwarantable; a very gross and mischievous perversion of his meaning.

The hope which the Bible bids the believer in Christ cherish is the hope of future life by means of resurrection from the dead. The great importance of the doctrine of the resurrection in the Christian religion is shown by St. Paul, when he says that "if the dead rise not, then they which are fallen asleep in Christ are perished." And in one of his epistles he speaks of certain persons in his own age who denied the future resurrection, which denial, he says "overthrew the faith of some." If there be no resurrection, then there is no intermediate consciousness for the dead in Christ; they "are perished:" and the denial of this doctrine was to altogether overthrow the Christian faith—because if there be no future resurrection, then there is no life after death; no future life at all. Here it is at once apparent how pernicious is the influence which the expectation of a state of bliss for the separate soul after death is upon the doctrinal system of Christianity. The resurrection is comparatively forgotten, or at all events, is but little heeded by the Church of modern times. This great event is, by the general concurrence of Christian professors, regarded as very remote, as far hence in the history of the human race. In consequence, it has little practical influence upon the spiritual life of Christians, and is very rarely referred to in the modern so-called orthodox preaching. The reason is obvious, the church is anticipating a preparatory glory for the separate soul; and believing the soul to be essentially the human personality, it entertains but little thought about its companion in the grave.

Besides this, there is yet another and most serious evil resulting from, or at least fostered by the unscriptural notion of the soul's separate state of happiness in death. The evil referred to is the general infidelity of the church on the subject of Christ's personal advent as an event to be daily looked for and desired by the faithful. Our Lord frequently urged his disciples to watch and wait for his coming, lest, coming suddenly, he should find them sleeping, and not actively engaged in his service, and anticipating his arrival. The Apostolical epistles also exhibits the expectation of Christ's speedy coming as a grand motive to Christian faithfulness. When Christ comes again, it is to raise the dead Church to life, who will slumber in their graves, until they "shall hear his voice and come forth." The resurrection depends upon the second advent of Christ, who is "the resurrection and the life;" hence every Scriptural believer longs with Paul for the "redemption of the body," and that he may "attain unto the resurrection of the dead,"—and with John utters the fervent prayer that his Lord may come quickly. "He which testifieth these things saith. Surely I come quickly. Amen. Even so. Come Lord Jesus!"

Very much, indeed all, of the obscurity of the passage under consideration, arises from understanding what are evidently but figurative expressions in a strictly literal sense. The popular interpretation of this ill-used text owes all its value to this great mistake. Expositors insist upon the phrases clothed upon, absent from, at home in, being understood as strictly literal expressions, and hence they speak of that which is clothed upon; that which is at home in. And this something they maintain is the separate soul. Now the language of our text adopts the imagery of clothing, as most common and familiar to the ancient Hebrews, and it is manifestly to do violence to a law of writing and speech, to take figurative expressions in a rigidly philosophical and literal sense. Being "clothed upon with our house which is from heaven," simply signifies becoming possessed of the spiritual or immortal nature, without any reference to the manner of the possession. And so also "to be absent from," and to be "at home in" the body, does not indicate the manner, but simply the fact of mortality, or superiority over it by being immortalized. In Peter's second epistle, ch. i. 18, the Apostle thus writes—"I think it meet, as long as I am in this tabernacle, to stir you up, by putting you in remembrance; knowing that shortly I must put off this my tabernacle." On this passage the pious and learned Dr. Watts thus comments—"The soul or thinking principle of the Apostle Peter, which is here supposed to be himself, is so plainly distinguished from the tabernacle of the body, in which he dwelt for a season, and which he must 'put off' shortly, and most evidently implies an existence of this thinking soul, very distinct from the body, and which will exist when the body is laid aside. Surely the conscious being and its tabernacle or dwelling place, are two very distinct things; and the conscious being exists when he puts off his present dwelling."—Essay towards the Proof of a Separate State.

Here is an example of forcing a meaning out of the figurative terms by which a truth is illustrated; a method of interpretation which, if cast in a canonical form, the eminent Doctor would not for one moment have allowed. In proof of the incorrectness of the Doctor's exposition of the above passage, let the reader endeavor to interpret on his principle the following kindred texts,—"Put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ."—Rom. xiii. 14. "As many of you as have been baptised into Christ, have put on Christ."—Gal. iii. 27. "Seeing that ye have put off the old man with his deeds, and have put on the new man."—Col. iii. 9, 10. "Put on, therefore . . . . . . bowels of mercies," &c.—Col. iii. 12. "Put on charity." —Col. iii. 14. "He put on righteousness as a breast-plate, and a helmet of salvation upon his head; and he put on the garments of vengeance for clothing, and was clad with zeal as a cloak."—Isa. lix. 17.

Prof. Hagenbach, summing up his historical sketch of the opinions of the Primitive Fathers on the soul and its immortality, thus writes,—"The whole question, however, had more of a philosophical than Christian bearing, as the idea of immortality itself is abstract-negative. On the other hand, the believer by faith lays hold of eternal life in Christ as something really existing. The Christian doctrine of immortality cannot, therefore, be considered apart from the person, work, and kingdom of Christ, and must rest upon Christian perceptions and promises."—History of Doctrines, vol. 1., p. 153. THE 1260 DAYS OF DAN. VII.

If these days are a symbol of years, as most seem to suppose, and mark the period of the continuance of the Papal power from its supremacy to its close, then the question arises, when did that supremacy begin?

We wish, after the experience of the past, to speak without positiveness as to any given year in which that period commenced. If, however, we are to look for the supremacy of the Bishop of Rome as the point at which to commence, he could not have had that supremacy as late as A. D. 590. "Bower's History of Popes," printed in "London, 1750, is before us. Bower was "Public Professor of Rhetoric, History, and Philosophy, in the Universities of Rome, Fermo and Macerata; and in the latter place Counselor of the Inquisition." Here then we may expect correct information relating to the Papacy.

Bower informs us, Vol. 2, page 459, that the "Emperor Mauricius" assembled a Council of the Patriarchs, all the Senators of the Imperial City, and the Metropolitans:" that, "By this great Council was confirmed to John of Constantinople, the Title of Universal Bishop, to be enjoyed by him, and his successors in that See." Bower adds—"I say confirmed, for the Bishop of Constantinople had long before this time a lawful claim to that Title."

Here is evidence that the Bishop of Rome was not Universal Bishop up to this period, 588. It is true that this transaction at Constantinople stirred up the rage of the Bishop of Rome, and he called upon the former to "renounce the title which he had usurped in the pride of his heart, at the instigation of the devil, to the great debasement of the rest of his brethren." Shortly after, the Bishop of Rome died, and was succeeded by "Gregory the Great," in 590. Gregory, at the time of his election, was evidently, for the times in which he lived, a good man, and it was a source of great distress to him to be called to occupy the post of Bishop of Rome.

As late as 596, Pope Gregory declared that the title of Universal Bishop was "scandalous, profane, blasphemous"—and that "whoever calls himself Universal Bishop, or desires to be so called, in the pride of his heart, is the forerunner of Anti-Christ." Bower, Vol. 2, page 515.

Could he at the same time, himself, have been a Universal Bishop, or exercising the functions of such an office? We think these facts are sufficient to establish the point, that, up to this time, the Bishop of Rome had neither claimed nor used the prerogative of a Universal Bishop. If others had sometimes called him so, that does not at all affect the question: he clearly never had been such in fact down to 596.

Gregory, like most other men raised to high offices in the church, became corrupted; and towards the last of his life manifested the spirit of devils more than the spirit of Christ, which seemed to characterize him at first; and it is truly painful to see the change that came over him, in his controversy with the Bishop of Constantinople.

In the month of November, 601, "The Emperor Mauricus was driven from the throne, and inhumanly murdered, and one Phocus a Centurion, raised to the Empire in his room." Bower, Vol. 2, page 529. Mauricius had given no particular provocation to Phocas, who was quite unknown to him, and yet the tyrant, not satisfied with putting him to death, for his greater torment and grief, ordered five of his sons to be first inhumanly murdered before his face. Such a scene of unparalleled cruelty drew sighs and tears from all the spectators but Mauricius himself, who beheld the death of his children quite undisturbed, without shedding a tear, or betraying the least mark of grief or concern. During the whole time of that tragedy, the most shocking to the eyes of a parent that was ever beheld, he continued, in appearance, quite unaffected, only repeating, as each of his children received the fatal blow—Just art Thou, O Lord, and Righteous are all thy Judgments. Mauricius was beheaded last, and their heads were all brought to Constantinople and cast into a heap near the Tribunal, where they lay till they became offensive, then the Tyrant [Phocas] suffered them to be buried."—Bower, Vol. 2, page 531.

We have given this extract for two reasons—First, to show the wicked character of Phocas, who is hereafter to establish the supremacy of the Bishop of Rome: and, Second, to show how Gregory the Great had apostatised from the spirit that characterized him at his election. After Phocas had manifested his horrible depravity and cruelty towards Mauricius and his family, Gregory wrote him a letter, in which he says—"We have been hitherto most grievously afflicted; but the Almighty has chosen you, and placed you on the Imperial Throne, to banish, by your merciful disposition, all our afflictions and sorrows. Let the heavens, therefore rejoice, let the earth leap for joy; let the people return thanks for so happy a change." Bower, Vol. 2, page, 533.

In the same letter Gregory says—"May the Holy Ghost that dwells in your breast, ever guide and assist you."! Phocas commenced seeking the favor of Gregory, Bishop of Rome, because his wickedness did not meet with favor from the Bishop of Constantinople, who opposed his murderous projects against the family of Mauricius. "The Empress Constantina, and her three daughters, had fled for refuge to one of the churches of Constantinople. Phocas ordered them to be taken by force and publicly executed. But they found in the Patriarch Cyriacus, a kind friend and protector, who opposing with great resolution and courage, the execution of the order, would suffer no kind of violence to be offered them in their asylum."—Bower, Vol. 2, page 537.

From that time Phocas conceived a hatred of the Bishop of Constantinople, which the Bishop of Rome took advantage of to gratify his own envy and hatred; hence he flattered the blood-thirsty tyrant, Phocas, and extolled him almost to a God. Gregory died in 604, on the 12th of March. If Phocas conferred on him the title of Universal Bishop, Bower has not recorded it: though it appears that he took every opportunity to oppress the Bishop of Constantinople and exalt the Bishop of Rome. On the 13th of September, the same year that Gregory died, Sabinian was chosen to fill the vacancy of Bishop of Rome. He proved to be a wicked, avaracious, and cruel wretch, and was hated by the Roman people. He died, or was killed, Feb. 22d, 606. He was succeeded by Boniface III. His election, Bower supposes, was not till about one year after the death of Sabinian; yet he says, "no writer accounts for" so long "a vacancy." It is possible that the defect may be in the date of his election; and that it should have been 606 instead of 607.

With respect to Boniface, we shall give a copious extract from Bower, Vol. 2, page 545. "Boniface was a Deacon of the Roman Church; was a native of Rome, and sent by Gregory, in the year 603, to Constantinople, with the character of his Nuncio [Envoy or Messenger] to congratulate, in his name Phocas on his accession to the Imperial Crown. Upon the death of Gregory he returned to Rome: and Sabinian, dying soon after his return, he was chosen to succeed him, as one who was not only well known to Phocas, but greatly favored both by him and his wife; for by flattering the usurper, as Gregory had done, and conniving at his cruelties, if not applauding him in them, while the rest of mankind exclaimed against him as an outrageous Tyrant, he had so insinuated himself into his good graces, as to become one of his chief favorites, or his only favorite, being the only person in the whole city of Constantinople, who approved, or could so dissemble as to make the tyrant believe that he approved of his conduct. For that merit alone Boniface was chosen; and though he enjoyed his new dignity but a short time, for he did not even live to the end of the year in which he was raised to it, yet it may truly be said, that to him alone the Roman See owes more than to all his predecessors together. For he no sooner found himself vested with the Papal Dignity, than, taking advantage of the partiality and favor of Phocas to him, and of his aversion and hatred to the Patriarch Cyriacus, he not only prevailed on the Tyrant to revoke the decree, settling the title of Universal Bishop on the Bishop of Constantinople, but obtained what no man could have believed could have ever come into the thoughts of a successor of Gregory to demand, were it not vouched by all the historians to a man, and obtained a new decree, settling on himself and successors, that very title, which his immediate Predecessor, but one, and all his Predecessors, the best and greatest, had so often condemned in any Bishop whatever, and rejected with the utmost abhorrence, when offered to himself, as vain, proud profane, impious, execrable, blasphemous, anti-christian, heretical, diabolical.

"Boniface could not but know that the controverted title had been thus stigmatised over and over again, by two of his Predecessors successively, Pelagius II. and Gregory. But so inconceivably great was his ambition, so utterly unbridled was his desire of exalting his See, that rather than let slip the favorable opportunity that now offered of raising it higher than it had ever yet been, or, in the opinion of his predecessors, ought ever to be, he chose to stand condemned, out of their mouths, as a Heretic, a follower of satan—a rival of satan in pride—and the forerunner of anti-Christ. The Edict issued by Phocas on this occasion has not reached our times; but that thereby the Decree of the Council of Constantinople in 588, entailing the title of Universal Bishop on the Bishop of Constantinople, and his successors was revoked and annulled; that the said Title was transferred from them to Boniface, and his successors, and the Bishop of Rome declared the head of the whole Catholic Church, is what all the historians, whom I have quoted above, unanimoulsy vouch.

"In the Bishop of Constantinople, the title of Universal Bishop is generally thought to have been no more than a badge of honor, or an honorary title, without any accession of power. And it does not appear, that in virtue of that title, he ever exercised or claimed any. But Boniface had scarce obtained it when he took upon him to exercise an answerable jurisdiction and power—a jurisdiction to that time [606 or 607] unknown and unheard of in the Catholic Church. No sooner was the Imperial Edict, vesting him with the title of Universal Bishop, and declaring him Head of the Church, brought to Rome, than he assembled a Council in the Basilic of St. Peter, consisting of 72 Bishops, 34 Presbyters, and all the Deacons, and Inferior Clergy of that city: he acted there as if he had not been invested with the title alone, but with all the power of an Universal Bishop—with all the authority of a supreme head; or rather, Absolute Monarch of the Church. By a Decree which he issued in that Council, it was pronounced, declared and defined that no election of a Bishop should henceforth be deemed lawful and good, unless made by the people and clergy, approved by the Prince or Lord of the City, and confirmed by the Pope, interposing his authority in the following terms:—'WE WILL AND COMMAND.' Thus was the power of the Pope, as Universal Bishop—as Head of the Church, or in other words, the Papal Supremacy, first introduced."

Such appears to be the true history of Papal Supremacy. Whatever may be said of the acts of Justinian in 533 to 541, it is clear no Bishop of Rome claimed or exercised that power till the period brought to view by Bower, as briefly presented in the foregoing extracts. Now, unless the Papal Supremacy can be dated from the decree of the Council at Constantinople, 588, which is not at all probable, there is no point of time short of 604 to 607 for it. From that point 1260 years carry us to 1864 to 1867, as the time when Papacy is to meet the "Judgment" of the "Ancient of days." We repeat what we have before said—the termination of 1260 years marks the sum total of the existence of the "little horn," Dan. 7th, and not 45 years before. It will be "destroyed," and there ends its "time, times and dividing of time." We are satisfied that those who take any other view of the subject are doomed to be disappointed.

The foregoing view we gave, substantially, seventeen years since, and were not a little ridiculed or sneered at by definite time setters; because, they said, we "put off the Lord's coming." But now some of those same persons, come forward and claim to have discovered that the Lord is coming in years which we pointed out seventeen years ago as the period when Papacy would fall, or be destroyed. Their assumption is, that Christ's second coming is in 1866—1868; and they believe the 1260 years of Dan. vii. ended half a century since, and that Christ is now to come. Our position is that Papacy falls between now and the close of 1868, probably; but that it does not follow, certainly, that Christ will then come; it may be several years later; and of this view they cannot complain, because they maintain the 1260 years of Papacy are long since past, but that the coming of Christ is yet future. The difference between them and us, is we believe there is time given in the prophetic numbers for the fall and destruction of the Papal power, and that the time is about '66 to 68. But we do not believe any such definite time is given for the second advent of Christ. They believe the days of Papacy (i. e., the 1260 days) ended long ago, and that the prophetic period is given for the coming of Christ, and that time is '66, 67 or 68, which we do not believe for reasons we have given in previous numbers of this paper.

THE POPULAR NOTION OF HELL.

The following will give an idea of what superstition can do by the aid of fancy to paint an "orthodox" hell. We think most "orthodox" teachers in these days would be unwilling to admit that they now believe in such a hell as here described. We hope the time is not far off when they will all abandon such absurd, unscriptural, and blasphemous ideas of the government of a holy, just, and loving God. Yet that the following is a fair sample of the ideas entertained of hell by most all christendom, who claim to be sound in faith, cannot be denied. That "the punishment of the wicked will be eternal" we have no doubt; but that such a punishment as is described in the following article is the true one, we no more believe than we do that God can lie. He has taught us "the wages of sin is death." Nothing short of this is the punishment proper; nothing beyond this is recognized as pertaining to that punishment of sinners in the word of eternal truth. Now read the following, and be astonished that good men were ever so blinded as to credit such a representation of God's dealings with the creatures his power brought into existence.

"The punishment of the wicked will be eternal. Hell fire will be unquenchable; Mark ix. 34. Everlasting, Matt. xxv. 41. The smoke of their torment will ascend up for ever and ever, Rev. xiv. 11. This eternity of punishment will be a fearful aggravation of it; if you saw a malefactor torn to pieces, with wild horses, or thrown down into a fiery furnace and there burnt to ashes, you would say that either of these were dreadful punishments, though the pain possibly might not endure a quarter of an hour, for death concludes all bodily pains here. What then will it be to endure the torments of hell forever? A small pain if it should last long would be very irksome; much more such racking pains by the stone, stranguary, gout, cholic and the like; if they should continue for a year or a month together, how miserable would they make life to be? Yes, if a man should hold out but one of his fingers in the fire but for a day, it would afflict him more than all outward comforts could delight him. The torments of hell will not be in one part only, but in every part; not in a weaker degree, but in the greatest extremity; not a day, or a month or a year, but forever; the wicked will be always dying, never dead; the pangs of death will be ever upon them, and yet they shall never give up the ghost; if they could die they would think themselves happy; they will always be roaring and never breathe out their last; always sinking and never come to the bottom; always burning in those flames, and never consumed; the eternity of hell will be the hell of hell. When our Saviour endured equivalent punishment to this of hell for his people, it had not this circumstance of eternity in it, there being not that need, because of the excellency of his person; in that though the pains of hell got hold on him, yet they could not keep him in hold; but he broke through them and triumphed over them, and could say in the conclusion, it is finished; but the damned will not be able to break through their punishment; they will be compassed about with it, and hedged in and shut down, and never be able to lift up the head; never shall they say of this punishment, it is finished, for their pains will always be as it were beginning; when they have spent the time of as many years in hell as there are stars in the firmament, sands on the sea shore, and motes in the sun, their torment will be as it were beginning, and no nearer a conclusion than the first day they were cast into that place. Who can express this eternity? When we launch forth our thoughts in the consideration thereof, we lose them quickly, it being such a deep which cannot be fathomed; such a vast ocean which cannot be measured; yet a little to extend your thoughts in the consideration of the eternity of the wicked's punishment, I shall by one or two suppositions illustrate something of the vastness thereof.

"Suppose this globe of the earth [on which we tread] was hollow, that it were filled up with great folio books as full as it could hold; and moreover their were books heaped upon it to fill up the whole circumference of the air round about it: yea that the whole space to the place of the utmost verge of the etherial heavens were filled with books, and all this vast number of books were filled with figures in the highest degree of multiplication. O what a number of books would there be in the whole space! What a number of figures in these books! And what a vast number would there be deciphered by these figures? A bit of paper half as broad as a half-penny will hold the figures of the number of as many years as has been since the creation of the world. What then would a whole leaf of a great folio book hold? What then would a room full of folios hold? What would the whole world full of folios hold? Now if at the end of time, when the wicked go to hell, God should fill the whole space of the world full of folios, full of figures, of numbers, and tell the wicked that every thousand years one of these numbers should be subtracted, and promise them when all the numbers were subtracted out of all these books, they should have a release out of their torments; they would have a small spark of hope, that after the subtraction of so many millions, millions, millions, of innumerable years, yet at last there would be an end, there would be time then set, and a wearing towards an end. Yea, if we could cast our thoughts so far on a supposition, that all this number of years, wherein all this number of years were subtracted, by one in a thousand years, were past and gone, yea wherein they were all subtracted, as many thousand times as the numbers of the figures in all these books would amount to; yet even then the punishment of the damned would be as far from ending as at the very first beginning of them.

"Yet if there were as many worlds, as the number of the books before supposed would arise unto, and these worlds continue as many years, as by this account there would be worlds; and all these worlds were filled with angels and men, and all these angels and men should be employed in nothing else from the beginning of these worlds unto the end of them, but in conceiving numbers of years unto the uttermost conception which they could have of numbers; to us what an inconceivable number of years would there be conceived by so many angels and men, in so many years, in so many worlds? Yet if all the vast number of years were joined to the end of the time, wherein all the number of the figures of so many before mentioned books, were subtracted by one in a thousand years, and these multiplied as many thousand times as numbers were conceived, such a vast number of years would reach a great way, but they would not be so much as a hair's breadth in the measure of eternity; and if you would suppose the space of all these years, too, to be spent by the damned in torments! even then their torments would be as far from a conclusion, as they were upon their first entrance into hell. Oh eternity! eternity! How infinite and immeasurable! How horrible will the thoughts of eternity be unto the damned, to be punished so extremely and that without any intermission or hopes of conclusion, to fall into such a horrible pit and fiery lake, and there burnt forever, without any possibility of ever getting forth! Oh dreadful! Oh blind world! Oh sottish sinners! that take no more care to avoid, and get deliverance from such a punishment, as this which they are exposed unto, and will be the certain consequent of sin, without repentance.—Rev. Thomas Vincent.

And we say—"Oh blind" priests that can preach such blasphemies, and pretend to father them upon the God of truth! and "Oh sottish" professed christians who can believe such abominable lies ever emanated from God who "is love!" "Father forgive them, they know not what they do;" the foul spirit of inherent immortality has blinded their minds.

THE TWO CLOCKS.

Two clocks stood on the mantel. One was large and somewhat old fashioned, and had a regular orthodox tick. It seldom got out of order, but performed its duty like a veritable time-server, as it was.

One day, a smaller clock, which had got into very bad habits, and was altogether unreliable, was placed by the large one to be regulated. The pendulum was adjusted, the hands set to correspond with its neighbor's, and then it was wound up. Such a time as it made! Tick-tick, tick-tick, just as fast as it could go. It really seemed as though it must be trying to get ahead of time. But for all it made such a fuss, it didn't really accomplish any more work than its less demonstrative neighbor. The hands worked around just the same on one as they did on the other, and pointed exactly to the hour on each.

"Now what's the use of your making such a to-do? You can't accomplish any more work than old Slow and Easy, who travels on his regular beat, and only asks to be wonnd up once a week."

"But I'm so little," said Fast and Furious; "it takes me longer to go over the ground, and if I didn't travel as fast as possible I should always be behind time." So away he worked, with the most irritating tick, tick, tick, tick, tick, that ever was heard, until we were oblidged to have it removed to another room, where our ears and nerves would not be annoyed by it.

I couldn't help thinking of my friend Nellie. It is such a pleasure to visit her. She keeps no servant, but everything about the house is in such complete order you might easily imagine that several pair of hands had been at work. Step into her garden; it is her especial pride, and she has every reason to be proud of it, for it bears evidence of care and culture. You will remain to supper of course. Nellie leaves you for a few moments. Although the kitchen is close at hand, you hear no sound of preparation, and have already made up your mind, perhaps, to partake of a frugal repast. The bell rings just as you are in the midst of an animated discussion with Nellie's husband, and you enter the dining room. Hot biscuit, delicious cake, preserved and canned fruit, with delicate slices of smoked tongue, look quite attractive to a hungry man. But Nellie's face is not flushed; and she appears so calm, it does stagger your credulity somewhat to believe that no fairy has assisted her in her culinary preparations.

A perfect contrast to this is my friend Mary. She is constantly in a flutter herself, and makes everybody else feel in a sort of "springy" state. Everything she does seems to be an exertion, and if you should hear her tell all she had to do, or had succeeded in accomplishing you might imagine her a modren Mrs. Hercules.

And such trouble as she has with servants! Why, no woman was ever so persecuted, and lived. If she sits beside you to sew, she jerks her needle through with such violence, and fidgets so unmercifully, that you feel as though you were doing the work yourself, and losing your breath by the operation. Mary always makes me feel tired when I am with her. She is like the little clock. She puts herself in a flutter and everybody else, and after all don't accomplish such a great amount of work as you might imagine.

The fast running clock makes us think of a certain class of advent believers: "fast and furious" when they have "definite time;" but when that has past you will hardly know if they "tick" at all. Dear souls, when will they learn to wait patiently for the Lord? He will come, and come at the right time, whether you tick fast or slow; so, try and keep steady doing or suffering the Lord's will "till he come;" thus shall you be found of him in peace, whether he comes "at midnight, at cock-crowing, or in the morning."

GOD NEAR.

The thought that God is near, is, to the soul that is reconciled to him, unspeakably precious. He whom angels adore, who is the light of the universe and the glory of Heaven, who can fill the soul that loves him with joy and praise—has verified to his saints the assurance, that if they draw nigh to him, he will draw nigh to them. In gloom, his presence has cheered them, and in trials they have found refuge in his strength. In solitude, in calamity, in prison, when heart and flesh fail, he is near. Though riches take to themselves wings and flee away, though friends prove faithless, though earthly hopes wither, the heart may still stay itself on him. What heroism the martyr has shown, sustained simply by the sense of a present God! How heaven has seemed to stoop to earth and embosom the lowliest dwelling, if only beneath its roof the prayer of faith was uttered, or the heart opened its doors to welcome the great, divine guest! How the darkness of the valley of the shadow of death has vanished, as the saint leaned upon the rod and staff of a present God!

Faith, that opens the minds's eye to unseen realities, reveals to us the smile of a Father in heaven bending in pity over his weak and erring but penitent child. He is near to hear the unspoken want, to interpret the inarticulate sigh. He is near to guide and counsel and sustain. The saint pillows himself upon the bosom of his love. He communes with him in "the still hour." He listens to his voice speaking in the everlasting oracles and the unchanging promises. It matters little where on earth it may be. An Eliot in the Indian's wigwam, a Schwartz amid India's jungles, a Martyn on his Perisan death-bed, all find themselves alike surrounded by the same all embracing presence; and the ocean wanderer feeling that that presence makes his bliss, can exclaim—whether in storm or calm—in the last words of Sir Humphery Gilbert, "It is as near to heaven by sea as by land."

Who would not crave the heritage of those who in all their way walk with God, and enjoy his presence? It is the conciousness of that presence that turns every resting place into a bethel, and every place of prayer into a Tabor, that takes from the mind the oppressive sense of solitude, and makes heaven near while yet we linger in mortality. Soon we shall have the full vision of Him whom not having seen we love. Though unseen, his everlasting arms enfold the child he loves, and his guiding counsel directs its steps.

CLOSET PRAYER.

The Christian, in the stillness and seclusion of the closet, is not alone with God the Father. Jesus, 'the angel of the covenant,' is there. Jesus loves the closet, and never tires with the pleadings of the suppliant. The blessed High priest is there, who can be touched with the feeling of our infirmity and weakness, haying 'himself suffered, being tempted.' Jesus, the sympathizing friend, is there, listening tenderly to the tale of all our cares, wants, trials, sorrows, temptations, and disappointments. Jesus, the counsellor, is there, waiting with the exhaustless supplies of a wisdom infinite in its resources, literally to bestow without upbraiding, waiting to enlighten all our darkness, and impart the wisdom which is profitable to direct all our affairs, no matter how trifling or insignificant they may seem to us. Has he not 'numbered the hairs of your head,' and does not his eye notice the fall of a single worthless sparrow to the ground? Jesus, the advocate, is there, ready to mingle our feeble plea with the fragrant incense of his all-prevailing intercession; for does he not say, 'I know that thou hearest me always?'—ready to work in the heart by the power of his Spirit, a mighty faith, which shall wing our petitions for a still more heavenly flight; for faith is to prayer, what the feather is to the arrow—it carries it upward, still upward, till it floats into the eternal presence, and brings down in answer a shower of blessings.

If such is the power of prayer—if it is the key which unlocks the treasury of heaven, should the closet be such a neglected place? Why should the Christian slightly value his interviews with God, and Jesus, and the divine Spirit? Why should he fear to come with his confessions, his perplexities, his little daily difficulties, which are in truth his cross and crown of thorns? The child who loves and trusts his parent, asks not only for those things which constitute the necessities of life, but he comes with his minor and less conspicuous needs—and that formula of prayer, sublimely simple, which the Saviour has dictated for us, speaks not only of those deep and awful interests which concern us in the unseen, unknown future, but it says, 'Give us this day our daily bread!'

O, if we could only arouse our slumbering minds to take more adequate views of God in his goodness and condescension to us, how much more frequent and joy-freighted would be our visits to the closet, where he loves to meet his children with smiles and a blessing.

The Year 1866.

The following was taken from the Hartford Times, Conn. The Prophetic Times, Philadelphia, copies it and says, "We give it simply for what it is worth." It reminds us very much of the heathen oracles; it can be interpreted for good or evil; or for both good and evil as affecting different classes of men; the good and the bad. It may be interpreted of some dire calamity to America, or as a great blessing, by which "corrupters of the earth" will be destroyed. But we give the article to our readers as we find it. It is as follows:

"Some years since a discovery was made in this city which, though at the time regarded as only curious, seems now in the light of the present to be remarkable. A few days ago, an aged lady, a representative of a family of great repute in our Colonial days and in the early history of our State, died in this city. Among the estate which descended to her next kin was an old mansion situated on Main Street. Her heir, who is a gentleman now residing here, in looking over the various things which had been accumulating for more than a century, and stored away in the garret, found beneath a pile of rubbish a curiously carved, inlaid old box. The box is in itself a great curiosity; the carving upon it is very beautiful, and the whole finish of it is exquisite. The box was a good deal out of repair, and in looking it over to see what was necessary to be done to renovate it, upon one of the interior divisions were found written on wood these inscriptions of a prophecy. The first inscription is the rude rhyme:

"On July 14th, 1866,
America's fate is fixed."

Beneath it, in Latin, these words:

"O posteri, posteri, cavete vos
In anno 1866."—"O posterity, posterity,
Beware of the year 1866."

And signed,

"Propheticus es.—This is prophetic."

"Preceding these inscriptions is the date, July 14, 1766, and signed by the name of a gentleman who at that time was a distinguished inhabitant of Hartford.

"It will be observed that the date of this prophecy is ten years before the Declaration of Independence, and at a time when the attachment of the Colonies to Great Britain was at its height. That these inscriptions were made at the time they bear date there can be no doubt, for the signature above referred to is one which once seen cannot be mistaken, and occurs on many public documents in our archives."

The Tongue.—He that keepeth his tongue keepeth his soul from troubles, and not his only, but others also. But what a plague is the tongue of one whose heart has no, or very little grace. It is an unruly member full of deadly poison, set on fire of hell. By thy words thou shalt be justified, and by thy words thou shalt be condemned. How should Christians practice this exhortation, As He who hath called you is holy, so be ye holy in all manner of conversation. And let those who are given much to idle, unprofitable talk, but nevertheless wish to be considered Christians, take warning from these words: "If any man among you seem to be religious and bridleth not his tongue, but deceiveth his own heart, that man's religion is vain."—The Moravian.

Jewish Prejudices Abating.—Rev. Dr. Mayer, of the Jewish mission at Leghorn, Italy, during a recent tour through Germany, when he was almost continually in Jewish society, says: "There was not only no hatred against Christianity visible, but, on the contrary, an uncommonly warm feeling of brotherhood and heartiness expressed. Among all these encounters and meetings of educated people, with a single exception, I found favor, cordiality, attention, and even response. If I compare these observations with circumstances of twenty or thirty years ago, when Christians had a dislike to Jews, and Jews looked upon Christians as idolators and enemies of Jehovah and his people Israel, I must come to the conclusion that the Spirit of the Lord has worked in a wonderous way, and that perhaps thirty years hence greater wonders will be acknowledged by Jews and Christians alike."

Magnifying Evils.—Man doubles all the evils of his fate by pondering over them. A scratch becomes a wound, a slight an injury, a jest an insult, a small peril a great danger, and a slight sickness often ends in death by the brooding apprehensions of the sick. We should always look on the bright side of life's picture.

The Herald of Life.

NEW YORK, JUNE 21, 1865.

NO IMMORTALITY NOR FUTURE LIFE, EXCEPT IN JESUS CHRIST ALONE, AND BY A RESURRECTION AT THE LAST DAY IF DEAD, OR A CHANGE IF ALIVE.

The Western Mission.

Br. W. S. Campbell left this city last week, Wednesday morning, for Fulton Co., Ill., expecting to hold a Grove-meeting there, the first of a series of such meetings, to commence Friday last. We trust God will be with him and make him a great blessing to the people in that region. We gave him an outfit in the East, and hope the West may be able to sustain him, now that he is among them, during the summer and fall. We think his labors are needed there, and that he has "a mind for the work." Let us, East and West, sustain him by our prayers and such material aid as shall leave him without anxiety about things temporal. O, that our Life-giver may give to his servant a double portion of His Spirit for this good and glorious work. One Br., here in the East, now sends 25 copies of the Herald of Life, weekly, to Br. Campbell to circulate and help obtain new subscribers. Let the friends West remember, the way to keep alive the work is to take the paper and scatter it among the people. See that Br. Campbell has your names as subscribers before he leaves you, and give him your subscription money to forward to us, or bring when he returns. Be alive, friends in the West, to the opportunity you now have to get light on the great and glorious life theme. Scatter papers, tracts, and books; get the people to reading, and some cannot fail to be interested.

Doubtful Texts.

To build a doctrine upon a doubtful text—a text, too, that has no corresponding one to support it—is not the part of wisdom. We have made this remark in reference to the expression, Rev. xx. 5—"But the rest of the dead lived not again until the thousand years were finished."

We were shaken as to the genuineness of this text fifteen years ago, in reading "The Finished Mystery," by George Duke of Manchester. Granville Penn, in his edition of the "New Covenant," notices that it is "unknown in the best Vatican and Moscow manuscripts," and that "it is excluded from the text by Mathæi, in his second edition, though he had given it within brackets in his first edition." Some of the most learned have pronounced Mathæi's version the best critical edition of the New Testament. This fact made us cautious of any appeal to that text for many years past.

When the Syriac version was given us in English, by Prof. Murdock, our attention was first turned to an examination of that text; but lo! it was not there. The Syriac version, Prof. Murdock says, is the oldest version of the New Testament in any language. It was copied, of course, from some of the first Greek MSS., which are no longer in existence. This fact settled us that the text is undoubtedly spurious; and no one should attempt to build a doctrine upon it. It gives no support to any theory, to rely on such a text. There is not a text of like character in the Bible; and we hope none will appeal to it in any controversy; because, it weakens rather than strengthens their argument.

Immortality only through Christ.

"It is said, 'that we have proof from various passages in the Bible that immortality is only through faith in Christ.' John. x. 23, 'I give unto them eternal life.' 1. Jh. v. 12, 'He that hath the Son hath life;' instances, John iii. 15, 36; v. 40; xx. 31; Rom. vi. 23, and numerous other passages are to the same purpose. If it is admitted that the phrase 'life' in some, and eternal life in other of these passages mean only existence forever, the question is settled. But this, the very point to be proved, is assumed by Mr. Storrs."

So speaks one one of our learned opposers. Have we assumed the point spoken of? Never. If any thing was ever demonstrated, it has been demonstrated that those phrases in many important passages mean primarily the existence of the man forever; and no other construction can be put on them without doing violence to the language. Take for example the text John x. 28, "I give unto them eternal life." Does not this text clearly teach that it is a living existence that is spoken of? What follows shows that is what is meant; for the Saviour adds, "they shall never perish." Thus it is plain that life, living existence is what is promised, and it is explained by our Lord as the opposite of perishing, or death. Read it as our opposers explain it and it is stript of all its beauty and force. It would then read, "I give unto them eternal happiness, and they shall never be miserable."

We regard it as an impeachment of our Lord's honesty and sincerity to say that he used, so uniformly, the phrases, life, eternal life, when he intended to be understood to mean happiness, and not life proper. But take another text—"As sin hath reigned unto death, even so might grace reign through righteousness unto eternal life by Jesus Christ our Lord." Rom. v. 21. What is "eternal life" here? Do you say it is eternal happiness? Then its opposite, "death," in the text, means misery. Then it would read, "As sin hath reigned unto misery, even so might grace reign....unto eternal happiness." But will the context allow any such interpretation? What had the apostle said? "By one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin....death reigned from Adam to Moses, even over them that had not sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression:" verses 12 to 14. Here the point is settled as to what Paul means by the phrase death; and he concludes his argument by affirming—"as sin hath reigned unto death, so might grace reign through righteousness unto eternal life by Jesus Christ our Lord." Man dies by the first Adam: man lives again, if he ever lives at all, by the second Adam; and that life is an eternal one. It clearly means here existence in conscious being. That such a life will be a happy one, is true; but the phrase itself expresses the idea of life, of conscious existence, and of that "only." These examples are sufficient till our opponents shall do something more than assume that our Lord and his apostles do not mean what their words express.

Questions on the Future Age.

I wish to ask you a few questions. Paul says,—"Behold, I show you a mystery, we shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump; for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed." If I understand you right, this takes place when the Lord comes to reign over the nations of the earth, and by the raised and changed saints acting as kings and priests to those that are left of the nations, salvation will be offered to them, and many will be converted to God, and finally saved.

Ques. 1. Will they be as we are now in Adam's flesh and blood, or mortal?

2. If this is the case, how will they be changed to immortality?

3. Will there be another trump after the last, at which all are to be changed?

4. Will there be another changing process? If so, where is so important an event recorded in the word of God?

5. Will God give the kingdom under the whole heaven to the saints or children of the kingdom, before he clears out of it all those that offend or do iniquity? Jesus says he will remove those first that are symbolized by the tares.

Response.

We answer to "question 1st"—Those "left of the nations" will undoubtedly be in "flesh and blood," and liable to mortality; and the sinner, under that dispensation, will be visited with "plagues" and "punishment;" [see Zech. xiv. 16–19.] and, as "the wages of sin is death," there may be deaths in that age. Isa. lxv. 20 makes it probable there will be.

To the 2d question, we answer—In the same way, probably, as at the advent. If the inquirer can tell "how" that is done, he may have answered his own question.

To the third question, we reply—The "last trump" of this age brings the change of "all" the saints "who are alive and remain unto" that time; and hence can prove nothing as to those who are "left of the nations," who had not previously "heard" his "fame, nor seen" his "glory." See Isa. lxvi. 15, 16, 19.

Question 4.—We answer simply by saying—That each dispensation has its peculiar developments. There was no "changing process recorded in" the revelations made to those under the Old Testament as is now made to us, nor did our Saviour, personally, announce it in the full manner Paul has. The manner in which those who are "left of the nations" are to be changed, if they, after trial, prove worthy, is a matter no way essential to us in this age; but will, doubtless, be made known in that age; yet we are not even now left entirely in the dark, as inquirer may see if he will read Rev. xxii. 2. The leaves of the tree of life are to be "for the healing of the nations."

Ques. 5.—It appears to us that inquirer, by coupling together Dan. vii. 27, and Math. xiii. 41, has not kept up a distinction which is manifest. The kingdom, Math. xiii. 41, seems to us, clearly to import no more than those who were included in the professed church. Jesus says, Math. xxv. 1, "The kingdom of heaven shall be likened unto ten virgins; five wise and five foolish." These certainly do not include any but professed Christians, and yet they are spoken of as representing the kingdom of heaven. Out of that kingdom Christ will cause to be gathered all them which do iniquity, and all things that offend, or "all things that cause scandals"—so the original signifies. The kingdom here, then, imports the church made up of his professed followers, many of whom have been a scandal to his cause, and have practiced iniquity. When the work of purifying his kingdom, or church, is accomplished, "Then shall the righteous shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father;" and unto them, as kings and priests, will "be given the kingdom and the dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven," as heirs of God and joint heirs of Christ, and "all people, nations, and languages" shall "serve and obey him." See Dan. vii. 14.

"Many Mansions."

"In my Father's house are many mansions: if it were not so, I would have told you. I go to prepare a place for you. And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again, and receive you unto myself; that where I am, ye may be also." Thus spake Jesus in that memorable discourse which completed his teachings, and was preserved to us by the beloved disciple. At the first view the quoted language appears to express the belief of unenlightened Protestantism, that Christians go to heaven at death. In the light of the common preconception, how natural is the interpretation! "My Father" is God; his "house" is heaven; the "many mansions" are the prepared abodes to which the souls of the righteous have been continually ascending from Abel to the last expired saint. Thus far all is easy. But the next sentence is discordant: "I go to prepare a place for you." This demolishes the foregoing comment. If Jesus must go to "prepare a place," it is evident that all the Old Testament worthies have been without it. Where, then, did they go? And where did the righteous go, who died while our Saviour was upon earth, and before he prepared a place for them? How, according to the common idea, can the "many mansions" which "are" be reconciled with the "place" not yet, and to be?

But let us not be rash. Perhaps it will come out right in the end. We will try again. The "many mansions" exist in heaven, but they are unfurnished; they need to be prepared. The Old Testament saints put up with their incomplete condition the best way they could until Jesus came from the earth and fully fitted up their abodes. So that the New Testament saints, those who have died since Jesus went to heaven, have had one advantage over their older fellow-citizens—they found their mansions already prepared. This looks as if it might do. But, no; the next utterance spoils this plan as well. "And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again, and receive you unto myself; that where I am, there ye may be also." This annihilates the whole scheme of going to heaven at death. The place prepared is not attained until this same Jesus that is taken up into heaven shall so come in like manner. Jesus went in person to prepare the place: Jesus will come again in person to "receive" the accepted guests unto himself. The only way to occupy the prepared place is to wait till Jesus comes. This relieves the Old Testament saints from their uncomfortable position in unfurnished mansions, and places the saints of all ages on a common level until the "many mansions" have been prepared and Jesus comes to conduct all to their common home. And thus is justified the language of the Apostle Paul not only in 1 Cor. xv.; where he makes the salvation of those "who are Christ's at his coming" to depend on their resurrection from the dead: but more particularly his words in 1 Thess. iv. "For this we say unto you by the word of the Lord, that we which are alive, and remain unto the coming of the Lord shall not go before them that are [not in heaven, but] asleep. For the Lord himself shall descend from heaven....and the dead in Christ shall rise first; then we who are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air: and so shall we ever be with the Lord." The last clause exactly accords with the last clause in the text,—"that where I am, ye may be also."

It is obvious that the popular theory of going to heaven at death fails to harmonize with, much less to explain the text. Adventists have, of course, rejected the view referred to, and many have taken up with one that is in harmony with the doctrine of the resurrection and the reward at Christ's coming; but we think it is equally untenable in itself. It runs thus: "My Father's house" is the universe; the "many mansions" are the heavenly bodies rolling in space, of which the Earth is one. Jesus went to prepare one of these mansion—the earth—for the saints, and at the appointed time will come to take up his abode on the earth with the redeemed. This exposition is good enough as a makeshift—any thing is better than the notion of immortal soulist—but to us it is exceedingly farfetched and improbable. The natural import of the promise—"I go to prepare a place for you"—taken in connection with the subsequent sentences, is that the place to be prepared is not the earth. Jesus goes away to prepare it, and comes again—not to the place prepared, but to receive his people unto himself. If he had meant to be understood as coming to the earth as the prepared place, it appears to us that he would have expressed himself differently. He does not say—"that where you are there I may be also"—but "that where I am, ye may be also."

The true meaning of our Saviour's words is something quite foreign to either of those mentioned. A statement of Dr. Adam Clarke will introduce it. "Our Lord alludes here to the temple which was called the house of God, in the precints of which were a great number of chambers. 1 Kings vi. 5. Ezra viii. 29. Jer. xxxv. 2. 4; xxxvi. 10." In another part of John's history we read that "Jesus went up to Jerusalem and found in the temple those that sold oxen and sheep and doves, and changers of money sitting: and....he drove them all out of the temple....and said.... Take these things hence; make not my Father's house an house of merchandise." John ii. 16. That the phrase "my Father's house" is again applied to the temple in our text is proved by the remark (not taken into consideration by either of the before-mentioned explanations), "If it were not so, I would have told you." That is, if the temple with its numerous chambers or mansions did not stand before their eyes he might go into an explanation that under the existing circumstances was not necessary. We must consider something that was well understood among the Jews, viz., that the temple was a type of things to come. When Moses erected the tabernacle in the wilderness he was commanded to follow a pattern that was shown him in the mount. The epistle to the Hebrews contains distinct references to the hidden meaning of the tabernacle, which is called "a figure for the time then present." Heb. ix. 9. There is "a greater and more perfect tabernacle, not made with hands," (Heb. ix. 11,) "the true tabernacle, which the Lord pitched, and not man," (Heb. viii. 2). Christ is the high priest of the true tabernacle, "an high piest of good things to come" (Heb. ix. 11), who "is not entered into the holy places made with hands, which are the figures of the true; but into heaven itself." v. 24.

One peculiarity of the Mosaic dispensation was its priesthood. A class of men were set apart for the service of God in the temple, and all others were forbidden to intrude into the holy places. It is clear that this also was a type of the future. Instead of Aaron and his successors, Christ is high priest with an unchangeable priesthood. As Aaron had associates in the priestly office, so has Christ. With this idea, the text is explained thus:

Christ the unchangeable high-priest to the royal priesthood of the coming dispensation: "Little children, yet a little while I am with you. Ye shall seek me: and as I said unto the Jews, Whither I go ye cannot come; so now I say to you."

The royal priesthood to Christ:—Simon Peter said unto him, Lord, whither goest thou?"

Christ:—"Whither I go, thou canst not follow me now; but thou shalt follow me afterwards. Let not your heart be troubled: ye believe in God, believe also in me. In my Father's house [before your eyes] are many mansions: if it were not so, I would have told you. [These chambers in the temple are typical of the abode of the priests in future temple]. I go to prepare a place for you [the holy place of the future temple]. And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again, and receive you unto myself; that where I am, there ye may be also. And whither I go ye know, and the way ye know."

Royal Priesthood:—"Thomas saith unto him, Lord, we know not whither thou goest; and how can we know the way?"

Christ:—"I am the way, and the truth, and the life; no man cometh unto the Father, but by me."

Conclusion. The temple of the future age will be the antitype of the Mosaic. Christ at his coming will immortalize all the dead and living members of the future priesthood, and will receive them unto himself in the true tabernacle, which the Lord pitched and not man. Christ is now in the true holy of holies, into which he will receive his fellow-priests. They will yet sit in heavenly places with Christ, and sing, "Unto him that loveth us, and released us from our sins by his blood, and hath made us a kingdom, priests unto God even his Father; to him be glory and dominion for ever and ever. Amen."

The Wendell and Grant Discussion.

The Crisis account of "our discussion in Boston" opens with the following remarks:—

"It was stated the first evening that the resurrection was not necessary for judgment. This statement was met by Rev. xx. 13:—'And the sea gave up the dead which were in it; and death and hell (hades, 'the grave.' Marg.) delivered up the dead which were in them; and they were JUDGED, every man according to their works.' All could see that this Scripture, even as well as other passages, taught very plainly that death must deliver up the dead before they were judged; consequently the resurrection precedes the judgment. It is also very evident that when the sea shall give up the dead, and death shall deliver up the dead also, that then they will come to life. If death still retained them in its prison, then they would not be 'delivered up.' So long as the jailor keeps the prisoner in his cell, he is not delivered up for examination and execution. This point was not met."

Response and Suggestions.

1. The first sentence in the foregoing was reviewed in my recent article on "The Wicked Dead and Judgment." The remaining observations will be noticed in what follows.

2. The concluding remark, "The point was not met," is ambiguous. It is not clear to what "point" my brother refers. If he means that he adduced his "prisoner" illustration, and that the affirmative failed to show that for the purpose of the negative's argument it was worthless, it will suffice to say that the omission shall be made good in this article. If he means that his brother made no attempt to harmonize Rev. xx. 12, 13 with the view that the resurrection of the wicked dead is not essential to their judgment, his recollection when he prepared his report was sadly at fault. The entire justice of this remark he will appreciate when reminded of the use the affirmative made of a citation from the "Apocalypse of Henoch." If he means that "the point," whichever it may have been, "was not met" satisfactorily, it would have been as well to say that, and then leave the opinion to have its proper weight with the reader.

2. My reason for not now reproducing the reply I made to my brother's argument on "Rev. xx. 13," is that the interpretation of the passage that I then offered I have been led by maturer examination to discard. In some respects, by no means unimportant ones, my present understanding of the Revelator's words brings me nearer to Br. Grant's position, while in other and perhaps more important respects it makes our divergence in sentiment wider than it was before. I have ever believed it to be the teaching of Rev. xx. 12, 13 that "the dead," before they are "judged," must be "delivered up" by the sea, death, and hades; but I am now prepared to concede a point which I have formerly believed the passage did not necessarily involve, viz., that the delivering up denotes the proper resurrection of its subjects. Here I am now at one with brethren holding to the revival of the wicked dead. And, as a necessary result, I also fully coincide in their view that "the dead" of our passage are alive when "judged." I freely yield the point to Br. Grant that "If death still retained them in its prison, then they would not be 'delivered up.'"

3. So much in the way of concession to those who claim Rev. xx. 12, 13 as their ally against the non-resurrection advocates. Now for the broad difference that remains between Br. Grant and myself. He maintains (see Grant and Curry Disc., p. 83) that "the dead" in the passage under consideration are exclusively "a host of despairing sinners;" the righteous he believes are not included among them at all. He holds moreover that the delivering up, and the judgment, brought to view in the passage, are located a thousand years beyond our blessed Lord's second Advent. My own belief differs from all this as widely as possible, for I hold, (1.) That the transactions revealed in the passage will take place at the time of the Saviour's appearing; and (2.) That "THE DEAD," who are to be "DEDIVERED UP" and "JUDGED" are exclusively the righteous. The vindication of these positions must be reserved for another article; the remainder of this will be devoted to strictures upon

THE CRISIS "PRISONER" ILLUSTRATION.

4. I respectfully submit the point that Br. Grant's view of the condition of the wicked dead during the thousand years that precede their resurrection, has no fitting parallel in the case of a "prisoner in his cell" prior to "examination and execution." The illustration appears to be in various particulars inapposite. Let us see.

(2.) Prisoners, during the progress of their trial, always remain in the custody of the jailor or sheriff, or some such official; whereas—according to Br. G.'s notion—the jailor Death must entirely release his hold on the sinner before the latter can be "judged." The want of analogy between the two cases is thus very apparent.

(3.) In cases where the penalty of a crime is jail-imprisonment, the prisoner remains in custody clear through to the end of his term of punishment. Now the divine penalty is death, and, for all the purposes of its demands, to revive the dead sinner into life would seem to be an entirely useless and unworthy display of miraculous power. And the Scriptures give emphasis to this objection by showing abundantly that no such thing will ever happen. Mark you, my dear brother of the negative! the "wages of sin" you claim is "not dying, but death, which is the end of dying." It is true that many brethren on your side of this controversy think you have gone too far in making this concession; but you have made it—you do habitually make it,—and if you will only carry out the admission to its logical results, in the manner in which many of them would do it, you cannot fail to see that the unrepentant, when once in the clutch of Death, become his lawful prey forever. "The sting of death"—that which invests death with a fatal power over those that fall in its embrace—"is sin." How can we explain this inspired declaration upon the supposition that Death must, even temporarily, let go his hold upon the man who has died in his sins? These words of the Apostle, "The sting of death is sin," I have for many years regarded as furnishing an overwhelming argument against the resurrection of the impenitent dead; and to this day I know [not] how the text is explained by a single Adventist holding the non-resurrection of the wicked to be an error. Will not the Crisis do us the favor to try its hand on the passage? Its effort will be duly chronicled in the Herald of Life. To most of us, on this side of the question, the text named has no meaning if dead sinners are not to be held in death eternally. If we are blind, who will at least try to open our eyes? As we understand the concluding portion of Paul's Corinthian resurrection-argument, every man that, "at" or after "the last day," escapes from the domain of Death, will have the right to exclaim "O grave, where is thy victory?" This to us is the common sense view of the matter. And yet it is as certain as Holy Writ that none but the eternally saved will ever sing this exultant song. O that Adventists everywhere did but see this! How long will so many of them halt at the threshold of the truth which constitutes the crowning glory of the plan of redemption? And in what an unenviable attitude does The World's Crisis stand in relation to this grand theme! Professedly "devoted to the exposition of all Bible truth," and having among its readers thousands who would welcome a proper investigation of "all Bible truth," it nevertheless steadfastly refuses a hearing to the argument for Life only in Jesus Christ. It is hard—sometimes very hard—to believe that this proscriptive policy springs wholly from zeal for the honor of the Life-giver; but we will endeavor to "judge nothing before the time" in respect to the motives that we may misapprehend. Nevertheless, we feel certain that the "work" of Advent preachers who war against this Life truth contains much material that will not stand the fiery ordeal which is in the judgment to "try every man's work of what sort it is." Their position requires that they shall use any amount of wood, hay, and stubble in explaining the innumerable divine utterances that have a bearing upon the question, Who shall live again? Heaven grant that their eyes may be opened!

(4.) Br. Grant's illustration overlooks the fact the "execution" of a "prisoner" differs essentially from the act by which he is "delivered up for examination," or by which he is brought to trial. The "examination" is to ascertain whether he is guilty, and before the law his guilt is not presumed so long as it is not proved. Now apply these considerations to the theory of my brother. At the coming of Jesus, the "jailor" Death releases the saints from his prison-house, and they at once enter upon their career of immortal blessedness. But dead sinners he holds in his grasp, and to them this state of bliss is lost. After the expiration of a thousand years, there is to be the grandest jail-delivery the universe has ever witnessed: every culprit in the realms of hades is to be "made alive" by a "despised and rejected" LIFE-GIVER—and for what? Tell us, brethren of the Crisis school, What is it for? Is it to ascertain whether these despairing hosts are culprits? No—that was decided a thousand years before, when the saints were "delivered from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God," and they were suffered to "remain in the congregation of the dead." Is it to determine whether they are to be subjects of "the wrath of God"? By no means; for that too was just as fully settled a thousand years previously; and, what is more, this "wrath" had been during that entire period "abiding on them." They were not "accounted worthy to obtain" a "resurrection from the dead," and were hence not permitted to "see life." What kind of "examination" do such characters need? And how else can they be so effectually "executed" as by being let alone to all eternity? "Utterly perish in their own corruption"—is the epitaph that inspiration has prepared for the tomb-stone of all the finally impenitent. And this tomb-stone will be erected, to their "reproach and everlasting abhorrence," when Jesus comes. But the Crisis theory requires that a thousand years afterwards it shall be taken down for a time—and for what? Again we ask—for what? To make corruption more complete? That would be impossible. To give the wicked a share in the benefits that it is claimed Christ, as the restorer of what mankind lost in Adam, procured unconditionally for the race? Hardly that—for the risen wicked would assuredly, during their whole living existence, curse the author of such a benefit, and earnestly desire, above all things else, to be once more consigned to the oblivion of death! "Justice demands their resurrection." Yes—we have heard that plea many a time, and many a time have we (I speak of the holders of Life only in Christ) demonstrated its absurdity. The sinner in death wronged if he is not raised to an accursed existence and killed the second time! Cease, men of sense, to give utterance to such wild ideas! If you believe that the resurrection will be to them in any considerable sense an advantage, assert that belief, and then tell us wherein the advantage will consist. But, in reason's name, be entreated never to speak of the "justification of life" as something accruing alike to the righteous and the wicked, if in the next breath you mean to assert that this "justification" is, to the wicked, in its every aspect "evil, only evil, and that continually." And be entreated likewise never to speak of the dead sinner's "justification of life" as a "free gift," if you have the smallest faith that he can claim it on the score of justice. In a word, try to rid your theory of its glaring inconsistencies and contradictions. In so doing you will be in a fair way to discover that, in order to be in harmony with the oracles of God, you must get rid of the theory itself.

But, you say, the wicked dead must be judged. This is granted; but that they must 'stand before God," or "appear before the judgment seat of Christ," I deny. "If any man hear my words, and believe not, I judge him not: for I came not to judge the world, but to save the world. He that rejecteth me, and receiveth not my words, hath one that judgeth him: THE WORD THAT I HAVE SPOKEN, the same shall judge him in the last day." John xii. 47, 48.

But we are to inquire, Who are "the dead" in Rev. xx. 12, 13? and what about their judgment? This important matter will claim our next attention. R. W.

Theatres.

BY LUCRETIA B. LAMB.

Since the assassination of our much esteemed President I have felt that a darker stain than ever rested upon actors and theatrical exhibitions. I have ever regarded them as a nuisance. There may be honorable exceptions; yet, as a class, play actors are profligate and vicious. Were there no other evils connected with attending theatres save the character of the performers, I think Christians cannot be justified in giving them their sanction. We can see in this instance they but nurse and fatten the viper that stings them to death. Will not the dreadful drama acted in Ford's theater on the night of April 14 prove a timely warning to many not to enter the threshold of vice? for within is a vortex that has swallowed its thousands. Will not parents heed the admonition, that speaks to them in thunder-tones, to so shape and bend the pliant twig that it will not unfold the deadly upas, and prove a pestilential map of corruption like that of J. Wilkes Booth? Who would be willing to take his mother's place? If we would not reap to the whirlwind we must not sow to the wind.

I have an instance in my memory on this point that exhibits the influence of parental instruction and example. A promising lad of eighteen left a quiet country home to reside in a city. He seemed gifted by nature for public speaking; and to become a proficient in it was his highest ambition. His home and business in one of the large hotels in the city threw him into the company of play actors, of various grades, who discovered his taste and abilities. They made lucrative offers, if he would engage as an actor. To use his own language, he was strongly tempted to accept their offer—could see no harm arising from it: still, the warnings of his mother and her instructions, together with the great grief he knew it would cause her, decided his course; and now, instead of a good and useful man, as he is, he might have been a Booth or something of like character, but for the early impressions made on his mind by that mother who sought to train him in the way he should go.

I know at the present day it is popular to visit theaters. The great and many of the good are there; but the evils still exist which fester and work corruption. Many a young man can date his downward course to contempt and shame from his first entering the purlieu of a theater. And now, while a nation mourns, and the indelible mark of a Cain stains the memory of a gifted young man, let us be faithful as Christian patriots, Christian parents, who are hastening unto the coming of our blessed Lord, to use our time, talents and influence to rebuke sin, to encourage virtue and holiness, that God may be glorified and the lost saved.

Letters and Extracts.

From Eld. J. S. White.

The following article was sent to the World's Crisis for publication, and was rejected with no definite reason assigned. The items I here notice are only a very small part of the evidence that has come to us of moral principle, and sound religion which has attended the army from the commencement of the rebellion. J. S. W.

East Boston, Mass.

RELIGION IN THE ARMY.

It is interesting to have the evidence to believe that, while there has been so little religious interest in the quiet homes and churches at the North during the past year, there have been in progress, revivals of religion in the Northern armies at the South.

I cut from a religious paper in June, an account of a revival in Rosecran's army, in which two hundred had been recently converted, and had joined the army church. The writer's letter was dated May, in which be says the work was progressing. On the second Sunday in February, I was with the Baptist church in Norton, near the place of my birth, at which time, I spoke three times. At the close of the evening services, a young man, a member of the church, who was at home on furlough from the army, gave a very affecting account of his experience in the army. He said that he had never felt more sensible of the value and need of religion than since he had enlisted in the service. He said that many soldiers had come to him, saying that they never thought much of Christ till they came into the army. But now they felt the need of religion. In the camp of seven thousand which he left, he said there had been a prayer-meeting every day during the winter, and the soldiers came forward for prayer, from three to five hundred at the same time. Where has there been such a work as this out of the army since the rebellion commenced? It is evident, though some may curse the soldiers, others are praying for them.

Some who have returned from the war, and who were converted while there, said to me that they thought they should never have been converted if they had not gone into the army. Some have told me, whose friends have served nine months in the army, that they come back better boys in every respect.

I take the following from the Advent Herald, of Feb. 15th:—"A letter from Gen. Mead's headquarters says there has been a degree of religious interest manifested by the soldiers of late, that promises to be the absorbing sensation. Many of the regiments and brigades are holding protracted meetings in their camps, which are said to be largely attended and very interesting. A very large number have already been hopefully converted, and a still larger number of backsliders have experienced much anxiety for their soul's conversion."

Should it be said that these cases are an exception to the rule in the army, I would ask if they are not exceptions to the rule out of the army? And have there not always been exceptions to the rule? It may be said that many who seemed to have some religion, have lost it all since they went into the army. May not the same be said of many who seemed to be religious who never went into the army, and when there was no army? What became of the religion of many thousands who gave evidence of a change of heart in the year '41, 2 and 3, two years after; and in the great revivals of '56 and 7, when there was no war? What became of the religion of from one quarter to three quarters of all the converts in all the revivals for the last forty years? A few months after their profession, the religion they seemed to have, was minus. Many who have maintained their profession in a given place for a time, have lost it on changing their locality from one town or State to another, and sometimes when they have gone from one part of the same town to another. There is evidently a great many wayside, stony and thorny ground converts, who have not religion enough to endure any change or trial, but who fall away, even on the smallest influence that is brought to bear against them. A sort of mushroom religion, that comes up in the night, and is cut down in the first change of weather. How many who, having lived at the North with high profession of religion and moral right, on going to the South, when there was no war, have renounced all religion, except that of slave-holding, whipping-post, and grog-shop religion.

It may be said that there is a great deal of immorality in the army, and that no one should go there for the danger of being drawn away. Is there not a good deal of wickedness out of the army, and are not, therefore, persons in danger if they live anywhere? Then why not go out of the world, and so get clear of all bad influence? I have yet to learn that wickedness abounds in the army more than out of it, while there may be many there whose moral principles, loyalty to the right, and deep-rooted Christianity, may put to blush some of those who have not religion enough to pray for, and sympathize with the suffering soldiers in the field.

In a letter from the army of the Cumberland to the Boston Journal, dated March 2d, the writer says:—"I find that men of moral courage and Christian character at home, maintain their position here; and such men are honored and respected, even by the vile and vicious. I have met many such in the rank and file, as well as among the officers, commissioned and non-commissioned, who are true to their God and their religious convictions, as well as to their country. This is the rule, and the exceptions are less frequent, I think, than at home." J. S. WHITE.

BR. STORRS:—You will no doubt be somewhat disappointed at receiving a letter from me, as it has been sometime since I wrote before. When I last did so, I told you I would pay my subscription for the paper the next pay day. Well, I have not been paid but once since; and we got only four months pay. I was owing some, and neglected sending to you; but if you will excuse me this time, I will try and do better in the future.

I receive the Herald of Life very regular; and I am beginning to take a great interest in it. My chaplain is a very strong Presbyterian, and consequently is much opposed to the paper. I think it is a glorious messenger; and if every person will follow its teachings there is no danger but what they will come out all right in the end; that is my candid opinion. If you will tell me how to send you some money to pay my paper account, and a present, I will send some. I want to have a part go to help pay for Br. Smith's western horse; for if I live to get home I think I shall go west, and then I will hear him preach. I have had the good fortune to take Br. Collamore's place as Hospital Steward, to date from December 1, 1864. Br. Collamore is at home enjoying the comforts of life.

Please to write soon, and by return mail I will send you your dues and a present.

NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—We are glad to hear from Br. Slayton. We have continued to send your paper, and you can send us in a letter by mail any amount you wish to remit for the paper or to help pay for Br. Smith's "Missionary horse." Let us hear from you as often as conveinent.

Br. Storrs:—I have been waiting on the Lord for some time to open a door for me to labor among the Freedmen; but that field seems closed to me for the present. I am informed there are more laborers now in the field than can be supported. I feel it a sin for me to stand idle when there is such a call for laborers in the West. Hence if the way opens I will go West this Fall and labor to save men.

The great truth of "No Life out of Christ" is making a great stir among the Adventists of the Crisis school. A short time since I attended a meeting of "The (Advent) Christian Conference of Western N. Y., and Vicinity." It was a large meeting. Elders Himes, Low, Sweet, Brown, Fenn, Burr, and Turner were present. I was the sole representative of a firm believer in the "Non-Resurrection of the Wicked." Many and varied were the twists and turns made to avoid the conclusion that the children of the resurrection are the children of God. Luke xx. 36. We had one sermon on the conclusions in 1 Cor. xv, "If their be no resurrection: If Christ be not risen," &c. He proved conclusively that any future life depended on a resurrection, and any resurrection depended on Christ being raised. But he did not see the force of the argument in verses 17 and 18, "If Christ be not raised....then they ALSO which have fallen asleep in Christ are perished." I had a conversation with a man after the sermon, at which there were many listeners. I asked him if he believed any resurrection depended on Christ's having come into the world, died and rose again? He said, yes. I asked if Christ was a free gift? He said yes. Then if the wicked are raised it must be a gift—a blessing to them. And rather than to give up the idea that they must be tormented for a season, he claimed it would be a benefit to them. But when pressed to tell in what respect, he utterly failed. Thus will men go into all absurdities to prop a pet idea.

But the truth will eventally triumph. May the God of peace greatly bless you in your declining years. Yours for Truth.

CHARLES H. SUTTON, Manayunk, Pa., writes: I send my pledge herewith ($10) for the "Western Mission," as I learn it is to commence or has commenced. I know Br. W. S. Campbell well. But whoever the Board of Directors had thought proper to select would have been satisfactory to me.

Br. Rufus uses up Miles about right. Ninth and Callowhill St. Church, Philadelphia, is doing well. I have spoken for them several times: they know my views on the "life" question by this time. There is no time now to mince matters, nor to pat the devil on the back. I go for life only through Christ; or, in other words—No future life for the wicked dead. Yours for gospel truth.

J. HAMILTON, Fredonia, N. Y., writes:—I am desirous to do what I can to spread the light of God's truth in the earth; and as I feel assured the HERALD OF LIFE does hold forth the truth in a clearer light than any other religious paper, I will gladly do what I can to support it and those servants of the Lord who are preaching to the people no life out of Christ. I send you herewith $5 to be applied where you think it will do the most good.

NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—We have applied the $5 to aid this paper, as we think that, at present, will most aid the cause of the truth we seek to spread abroad. Our friends, whom the Lord has prospered, will do well not to forget this is the only periodical in the land, if not the only one in the world, that advocates the doctrine of a future and endless life only through Christ. Hence, if you believe and love that truth, do not forget it is the few who must sustain it for the present. Nobly have our friends done it hitherto, and we trust they will show the same zeal to the end.

Miss. E. H. JILLSON, writes from Manchester, N. H, Please send my Herald to Williamstown, Vt.; for, as I leave the dear saints of God with whom I have associated here, I shall look with more interest than before for our paper, through whose columns I expect to hear from the scattered flock. I feel truly to thank God for such a paper; for the instruction and encouragement I have received from it; and as my mind reverts to that little band gathered under the old "Chestnut Tree," I am led to exclaim, It is of the Lord, and verily you will have your reward; "for God is not unrighteous to forget your work and labor of love, which ye have showed towards his name, in that ye have ministered to the saints, and do minister: and we desire that every one of you do show the same dilligence to the full assurance of hope unto the end: that ye be not slothful, but followers of them who through faith and patience inherit the promises." Yours looking for the blessed hope.

RUTH N. PARKER, Rutland, Vt., writes:—I live in a place where I cannot get the HERALD OF LIFE I miss it very much. I like it the best of any paper I ever read. I like the truth it presents. I am a believer in "No Life out of Christ": it looks good to me. I want to be prepared to meet the King in his beauty. It will be a day of joy to those who are ready. I would like to subscribe for the paper, but I have not the money to pay for it. My husband was killed in the army, and I have two children to take care of and my health is poor, so I am not able to earn money; but I want the Herald, and if I can I will send the pay for it. I hope the Lord will bless your labor. We have good meetings here, but none believe as I do, Yours in hope of eternal life through Jesus Christ alone.

NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—As long as we edit this paper, every widow of a soldier, who wants the Herald of Life, shall have it, whether she can pay for it or not. We are glad to send it to them; especially to Sister Parker in Rutland, Vt., where the light of life only in Christ has been so systematically shut out. We send the paper to her, regularly, now and onward. May it scatter light up there.

The Forbearance of Love.

The Apostle speaks of "forbearing one another in love." In this sinful world, forbearance is necessary. If some did not practice forbearance, there would be little else than unmitigated strife. The great source of forbearance is love. Prudence, self-interest may prompt to it in some degree, but only love can furnish an adequate motive.

Love prompts us to forbear despising the weakness of others. The intelligent mind is prone to be impatient with the dull mind. The slow apprehension, the defective discrimination, the feeble will, provoke the contempt of him, who is rapid, clear-sighted and decisive in his mental operations. Scorn of intellectual weakness is one of the natural tendencies of the unrenewed heart. Who does not perceive its unkindness, injustice, and evil tendency? And yet, love alone can correct that tendency and cause us to feel a sincere respect for our brothers of low degree.

Love enables us to forbear to speak evil of any except when fidelity to Christ requires it. Probably no uninspired writer ever had an adequate conception of the evils of an unbridled tongue. Those who wholly avoid sins of the tongue are happy indeed. But this is a very rare attainment. It may not be difficult to avoid the sin of slander, and falsehood. It may not be difficult to preserve habits of exact truth in all that we say. We may say much that is evil of others, and yet speak nothing but the truth. But we should not speak of their faults except when required by manifest duty.

Love will enable us to observe this rule. We do not blazon the faults of those we love. We do not make known the shortcomings of our children. Love prompts us to be silent, or to administer, in secret, affectionate reproof. As Christians we are bound to love all men, especially the household of faith. If we always practice towards their faults the forbearance of love, a great source of evil would be dried up. Love will enable us to forbear to assert our just rights when the cause of peace can be promoted by silence. It is often the duty of Christians to suffer wrong, and to commit their cause to Him who judgeth righteou ly. But by nature we are exceedingly sensitive to our rights. He who wrongs us in our reputations or our property, is deemed a just object for punishment. We are apt to demand "an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth." We have a great regard for justice when our rights are invaded.

It is true that we were made to love justice, and it is also true that we have forfeited all claim to whatever rights we may have been endowed with. Sinners condemned by the justice of God, whose execution is demanded by justice, should not be loud in their claims for justice from their fellow sinners.

Love alone can enable us to relinquish our supposed rights, and "take joyfully the spoiling of our goods," or the blackening of our name. A sense of duty is not sufficient. Love,—the love of Christ shed abroad in the heart, love purified by the influences of the Holy Spirit can alone enable us to forbear threatenings and demands for redress, when the injustice of man touches us to the quick.

TRUE COURAGE AND QUICK OBEDIENCE.—The Belin journals relate the following incident which has just taken place in Prussia: "A pointsman was at the junction of two lines of railway, his lever in hand, for a train was signalled. The engine was within a few seconds of reaching the embankment, when the man, on turning his head, perceived his little boy playing on the rails of the line the train was to pass over. "Lie down!" he shouted out to the child, but as to himself he remained at his post. The train passed along on its way, and the lives of a hundred passengers were perhaps saved. But the poor child! The father rushed forward expecting to take up only a corpse, but what his joy on finding that the boy had at once obeyed his order—he had lain down, and the whole train had passed over him without injury. The next day the king sent for the man, and attached to his breast the medal for civil courage."

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. He often differs from them; but believes in a free exchange of thoughts. Books and Pamphlets

FOR SALE AT THIS OFFICE.

On all books and pamphlets sent by mail the postage has to be pre-paid.

SIX SERMONS on the inquiry, Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the Life-giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by GEO. STORRS; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This word contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in plain binding, 50 cents; in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near ten years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER: OR, MAN IN DEATH; AND THE HOPE FOR A FUTURE LIFE.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead, can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none there fore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD; OR, THE RIGHTEOUS ONLY WILL LIVE AGAIN. By GEO. STORRS. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the EDITOR of the HERALD OF LIFE. Price, $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.—IMMORTALITY: The Argument from Nature and Scripture, by Rev, T. M. POST, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by GEO. STORRS. Price, in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. POST, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a Essay on IMMORTALITY, for which a gentleman New York paid $150. It was intended to have the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men, with ut egard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. POST took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The REVIEWER followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The Author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

BIBLE VS. TRADITION: in which the True Teaching of the Bible is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity Life, Death, &c. Price, bound, $1. Postage 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. It is a work of much labor and research. The title indicates its object, and the performance shows the object was kept in view throughout. The language is sometimes severe on what is called "orthodoxy—more so than is desirable—but the value of the work, in general, cannot be over-estimated. Thousands of it have been sent abroad, and thousand more ought to be scattered. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subjects; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

Poetry.

BREVITY OF LIFE.

The following lines are said to have been written by a heathen, some time before the Christian era. Let us prize the light the gospel sheds on the future.—EDITOR.

Stern Winter hides his frowning face,
His frost dissolves again;
Soft Spring steps forth with gentle grace,
And smiles upon the plain.

The rivers burst their icy bands,
The birds resume their song,
The laughing Nymphs, now joining hands,
Dance merrily along.

Ah! fleeting are the scenes of earth;
How swift the moments fly!
Scarce do they spring to joyous birth,
Ere they begin to die.

While Spring breathes sweetly from the north,
Burnt Summer hastens on;
Then Autumn pours his bounty forth,
And lo! the year is done.

The beauties of the vernal sky
Shall hastening moons restore;
But in the dust vain man must lie,
To rise and bloom no more!

The choicest blessings earth can give
For transient use were made:
'Tis but a fleeting day we live,
Then turn to dust and shade.

Learning, nor rank, nor pious tears,
Nor beauty's sweetest charms,
When stern, relentless death appears,
Can snatch us from his arms.

THE FORBIDDEN FRUIT.

"Has Madame seen the fine peaches in the garden?" said the old gardner to Madame Hervilly. "I have never seen any so fine. I think some of them will weigh half a pound."

"Yes, Prudent, I have seen them, but not for several days. I am going out this afternoon. I want to count the peaches on the tree which I planted three years ago."

"I think there are a hundred and seven or a hundred and ten. I am not sure which. The tree is a little gem; in two or three years it will be the finest tree in all the garden."

While Madame Hervilly was talking with the gardner, her two sons, Rudolph and Jean, were on the lawn, with their sister Therese. They had dressed their little dog like a soldier. Therese had taken her dollie's muff for a cap, and Jean had made a long wooden sword, which was dangling by Frisquet's side, and the poor dog was having a hard time trying to walk on two legs, and be a dignified soldier.

The children laughed so heartily at the dog's funny capers that they did not notice what their mamma was saying to Prudent. Only Rudolph heard the word peaches two or three times, and, being very fond of the fruit, he wondered if they were ripe. Their mamma had forbidden the children to go into the fruit garden except with her permission, fearing they might eat some green fruit, and thus make them ill.

Just then the bell rang for the children to go in and prepare their lessons. They did not go very willingly, for the boys dreaded their Latin, and Therese disliked to practice her music. But Therese undressed Frisquet, who danced and capered as if he was glad the lesson bell had rung, if the others were not.

After the lessons were finished, the children were allowed to play an hour before dinner. Jean ran to the garden to finish pulling weeds out of one of the walks, his papa having promised him ten francs when he had finished. Therese got her little spade and followed to help him. But Rudolph did not like work very much, and was thinking about the peaches. So he walked off in another direction, entered the fruit garden by a back way, and soon came to his mamma's beautiful little peach tree.

"Prudent said he did not know whether there were a hundred and seven or a hundred and ten, so I will take three, and no one will know it." Ah, Master Rudolph, you forget God. Just as he put the peaches in his pocket he saw his mamma's dress through the trees, and he hurried away in another direction. Coming to a large fir-tree he sat down to eat his peaches. The first one was delicious; the second was still better; and, just as he was smacking his lips over the last mouthful, Therese came along, and seeing him, said: "Oh, Rudolph! I have been hunting for you: mamma wished me to bring her a branch of mountain ash, and I cannot reach it, nor can I find Prudent anywhere; and Jean will not stop his digging and weeding for anything but a thunder-storm, I believe."

"Well, come with me, and show me what you want, and I will get it if I can."

"You are really good, Rudy." Here Rudy's conscience gave him a terrible bite, for he thought that he had just been doing wrong; but he hurried on, and tried to forget all about the peaches.

The dinner bell rang just as the mountain ash was carried into the house. While at dinner Madame Hervilly noticed that Rudolph did not eat; he seemed to have no appetite, and she asked him if he was sick.

"No, mamma, only I don't feel hungry."

"I guess he is not sick; wait until the peaches are brought in, and then you will find he is well enough."

At this Rudolph blushed, and looked very simple.

"You need not blush," said his mamma, "it is right to be fond of peaches." She did not think her little son had been taking her fruit without permission.

It was a fine evening, and they all went out on the lawn. Rudolph was quite unhappy, and trembled when he heard his mamma ask his papa to go in the garden and see her peach tree.

It seemed to him that what he had done was written on all the trees, and they would be sure to find it out; but it was so dark they concluded not to go.

"Jean, how do you get along with your weeding?"

"Very nicely, papa. Therese helped me to-day, but Rudolph is not willing to do so."

"Well, your little sister is very kind, and you shall have your money, and learn to be useful, which is far better."

After a pleasant evening to all but Rudolph, they returned to the house; the children said "Good night," and went up stairs. Jean said his prayers and hurried into bed, and was soon asleep.

Rudolph knelt down, but he could not pray. "Peaches, peaches," was all he could say or think about. He remained on his knees about fifteen minutes; then, hearing his mamma coming up to say "Good night" again and see if they were all right, he jumped into bed. After his mamma had gone he tried to go to sleep, but could not. Then he began to talk to himself: "I am so silly to feel so restless. No one will know it. They cannot find it out. No one saw me, any way. After all, I think some one did see me. Oh, dear! I forgot! God saw me, and it is just the same as if the whole world saw me. I cannot sleep. I will go down and tell mamma."

That was the true way. Rudolph hurried on his clothes, and went down to the parlor. When he came to the door, his courage failed him, and he turned about to go up stairs. Then he said: "I will be brave," and hurried into the room.

"What's the matter?" said his mamma, frightened to see him come into the room at that time.

"What's happened?" said his papa.

"I could not go to sleep until I told you what I had done to-day, mamma. I went into the garden and took three of your fine, large peaches just before dinner."

"Did you eat them all?"

"Yes, mamma; I ate them under the fir tree."

"No wonder you had no appetite for your dinner"

"But I am very sorry I disobeyed you. I could not sleep, and I have not been happy since."

"I am glad you could not sleep, and that God gave you the courage to confess your fault, for we should never have known it if you had not told us."

"I know it, mamma, but God knew it."

"You say you are sorry, my dear child," said his papa. "What do you think you ought to do to show that you are sorry?"

Rudolph thought a moment, then said: "I don't know of anything I can do, only I will promise you not to eat another peach this season."

"Well, that will help you to remember, for you are so fond of peaches. Now we will kneel, and pray God to help you and forgive you." After the prayer Rudolph went to his room, and soon slept sweetly.

A few days after Madame Hervilly and the children were invited to dine at the house of a friend. While talking with her hostess, Madame Hervilly heard one of the children begging Rudolph to take a peach. "Don't you like peaches any more?" said Charlie.

"Indeed I do; I am just as fond of them as ever."

"Then why won't you take one now? These are very nice; do have one Rudy," begged Charlie.

"I promised not to eat any this season, and I will keep my promise."

"That's a queer promise; catch me making such a one;" and Charlie went off with his plate of peaches.

Rudolph did not know that his mamma had heard the conversation, nor why she embraced him so fondly when she said "Good night."

But after the children were all asleep she told her husband, and they knelt and thanked their kind Father in heaven that he had not allowed Rudolph to hide his fault, and had helped him to keep his promise about the peaches.—From the French of Madame De Witt.

THE ENTRY INTO RICHMOND.

The Christian Recorder (the organ of the African Methodist E. Church) has a correspondent, who is the chaplain of one of the colored regiments of the Army of the James. In a recent letter to that paper, he describes the scene on that eventful morning, and his own share in it:

My regiment was among the first that entered that city. I marched at the head of the column, and soon I found myself called upon by the officers and men of my regiment to make a speech, with which, of course, I readily complied. A vast multitude assembled on Broad street, and I was aroused amid the shouts of ten thousand voices, and proclaimed for the first time in that city freedom to all mankind. After which the doors of all the slave pens were thrown open, and thousands came out shouting and praising God, and father or master Abe, as they termed him. In this mighty consternation I became so overcome with tears, that I could not stand up against the pressure of such fulness of joy in my own heart. I retired to gain strength, so I lost many important topics worthy of note.

Among the densly crowded concourse there were parents looking up children who had been sold south of this State in tribes, and husbands came for the same purpose; here and there one was singled out in the ranks, and an effort made to approach the gallant and marching soldiers, who were too obedient to orders to break ranks.

We continued our march as far as Camp Lee, at the extreme end of Broad street, running westward. In camp the multitude followed, and everybody could participate in shaking the friendly but hard hands of poor slaves. Among the many broken-hearted mothers looking for their children who had been sold into Georgia, and elsewhere, was an aged woman, passing through the vast crowd of colored, inquiring for a man by the name of Garland H. White, who had been sold from her when a small boy, and was bought by a lawyer named Robert Toombs, who lived in Georgia. Since the war has been going on, she has seen Mr. Toombs in Richmond, with troops from his State, and upon her asking him where his body servant Garland was, he replied: "He ran off from me at Washington, and went to Canada. I have since learned that he is living somewhere in the State of Ohio." Some of the boys knowing that I lived in Ohio, soon found me, and said: "Chaplain, here is a lady that wishes to see you." I quickly turned, following the soldier until coming to a group of colored ladies, I was questioned as follows:

'What is your name sir?'

'My name is Garland H. White,'

'What was your mother's name?'

'Nancy.'

'Where was you born?'

'In Hanover County, in this State.'

'Where was you sold from?'

'From this city.'

'What was the name of the man who bought you?'

'Robert Toombs.'

'Where did he live?'

'In the State of Georgia,'

'Where did you leave him?'

'At Washington.'

'Where did you go then?'

'To Canada.'

'Where do you now live?'

'In Ohio.'

'This is your mother, Garland, whom you are now talking to, who has spent twenty years of grief about her son.' I cannot express the joy I felt, at this happy meeting of my mother and other friends. But suffice to say, that God is on the side of the righteous, and will in due time reward them. I have witnessed several such scenes among the other colored regiments.

HOW TO OVERCOME THE WORLD.

The things of the world, if we put them under our feet, increase our stature towards heaven; they are means of growing in grace, according to the use we make of them. If a man stands upon a pile of gold a foot high, he is a foot taller than other men, and sees further than they; but if the gold is above him, it weighs him down, and if it is before his vision, it darkens him. If we would use the world as not abusing it, we must stand upon it, we must climb by it towards heaven, not to be buried beneath it. The policy is not to annihilate the alluring objects of the world, but bind them to our service; not to make ourselves poor by having no riches, but rich by using them for Christ. Temptation greatly increases and strengthens grace if it is only used rightly. Hence James says, "Count it all joy when ye fall into divers temptations knowing that the trial of your faith worketh patience."

The things of the world, its vanities, its pleasures, its attractions, are like quicksilver, which is dark in itself, and you cannot see through it, but put it behind a plate of glass and you make a mirror out of it. Just so, if you put the vanities of the world behind the heart, if you put the heart on the right side of those vanities, they make your heart a mirror of heaven; they enable you to reflect the glories of the celestial world, and the radiance of the face of the Redeemer, when you look towards him; the bright uncovered side of the mirror being towards the Sun of Righteousness, his immage is reflected. But if you reverse the process, and put the things of the world before your heart, between your heart and heaven, then you see nothing through them, and there is no reflection in them of any heavenly object or light; the mirror side being towards the earth reflects only the earth, and the side that ought to be towards heaven is as dark as midnight.

Now, just this is the condition of men's hearts naturally. They are like a mirror, with the side that is coated with quicksilver turned upwards, and the side that receives an image and makes the reflection downwards. Of course earthly things are clearly reflected, but heavenly things are not at all. The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness unto him, neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned. And why! Because the vail is on the heart, and the vailed side only, the quicksilver side, the covered and coated side, is turned towards the things of the Spirit, while the open side, the side of vision and reflection, is only toward the things of the world, and reflects nothing else. The natural man receiveth the things of the world, and is wholly occupied and filled with them, but the things of the Spirit he neither receives nor understands. Hence the graphic power of that description of the men of the world, the careless and prayerless, "having understandings darkened, being alienated from the life of God through the ignorance that is in them, because of the blindness of their hearts." Being a heart blindness, it is voluntary blindness, because the heart does not turn to the Lord, that the vail may be taken away. And beneath the cover of this unbelief, Satan carries on his procedures also with the mind, and involves, the whole being in darkness. In whom the God of this world hath blinded the minds of them that believe not, lest the light of the glorious gospel of Christ, who is the image of God, should shine into them.

What then is to be done? Is it to hearts and minds thus possessed by the devil, that the promise is made, that when their hearts shall turn to the Lord the vail shall be taken away, and they shall behold his glory and be changed into his image! Just so. It cannot be made to any others, for always the hearts and minds that are turned away from Christ are under captivity to Satan, and are blinded and darkened by him. And the promise, if to any, is to such, for such need it, and Christ came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance, and they who are whole need no physician, but they that are sick. These vailed and darkened ones it is, then, to whom the invitation and the promise comes, that if they will turn their heart to the Lord, the vail shall be taken away and they shall behold his glory.

Now then, again, how to do this? Can I turn to Christ just as I am, darkness and all, guilt and all, in unbelief and insensibility and blindness? Or must I wait before turning to him, till these things are removed, and I can see clearly? You must turn your heart to him, with the vail on it, for him to take the vail away; for the beginning of life is in the desire for life, and the beginning of life is in turning towards the light. If you wish to reflect any bright object in a mirror, you do not scrape off the quicksilver, but you turn the face of the mirror to the object which you mean to be reflected. So now with this insensible and darkened heart, am I to wait till all its worldliness can be scraped off, till Satan be cast out, till the world and its temptations have no place, no hold nor existence within me, nor power over me, before I can look at Jesus, or turn to him, and trust in him? Nay, but I must turn the face of my heart to Christ, just as it is, and the moment I do that, then the world and Satan are behind me, by my position in reference to them, not their movement in reference to me. They never will retire from before me, till I look to Christ, and when I so look to Christ it is both at his words that the vail drops off and at his command that Satan retreats behind me. It is not my power that accomplishes either of these great results. Get thee behind me, Satan, is Christ's word for me, when I look to him as a suppliant, and the faith that prays is the eye that looks. What wilt thou that I should do unto thee? Lord, that I may receive my sight. And Jesus said unto him, Receive thy sight; thy faith hath saved thee.—Selected.

GEO. BANCROFT ON ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

The position of Abraham Lincoln, on the day of his inauguration, was apparently one of helpless debility. A bark canoe in a tempest on mid-ocean seemed hardly less safe. The vital tradition of the country on slavery no longer had its adequate expression in either of the two great political parties, and the Supreme Court had uprooted the old landmarks and guides. The men who had chosen him President did not constitute a consolidated party, and did not profess to represent either of the historic parties which had been engaged in the struggles of three quarters of a century. They were a hetrogeneous body of men, of the most various political attachments in former years, and on many questions of economy of the most discordant opinions. Scarcely knowing each other, they did not form a numercial majority of the whole country, were in a minority in each branch of Congress except from the wilful absence of members, and they could not be sure of their own continuance as an organized body. They did not know their own position, and were startled by the consequences of their success. The new President himself was, according to his own description, a man of defective education, a lawyer by profession, knowing nothing of administration beyond having been master of a very small post-office, knowing nothing of war but as a captain of volunteers in a raid against an Indian chief, repeatedly a member of the Illinois Legislature, once a member of Congress. He spoke with ease and clearness, but not with eloquence. He wrote concisely and to the point, but was unskilled in the use of the pen. He had no accurate knowledge of the public defences of the country, no exact conception of its foreign relations, no comprehensive preception of his duties. The qualities of his nature were not suited to hardy action. His temper was soft and gentle and yielding; reluctant to refuse anything that presented itself to him as an act of kindness; loving to please and willing to confide; not trained to confine acts of good-will within the stern limits of duty. He was of the temperament called melancholic, scarcely concealed by an exterior of lightness of humor—having a deep and fixed seriousness, jesting lips, and wanness of heart. And this man was summoned to stand up directly against a power with which Henry Clay had never directly grappled, before which Webster at last had quailed, which no President had offended and yet successfully administered the government, to which each great political party had made concessions, to which in various measures of compromise the country had repeatedly capitulated, and with which he must now venture a struggle for the life or death of the nation.

* * * * * * * * *

In some respects Abraham Lincoln was peculiarly fitted for his task, in connection with the movement of his countrymen. He was of the Northwest; and this time it was the Mississippi river, the needed outlet for the wealth of the Northwest, that did its part in asserting the necessity of Union. He was one of the mass of the people; he represented them, because he was of them; and the mass of the people, the class that lives and thrives by self-imposed labor, felt that the work which was to be done was a work of their own: the assertion of equality against the pride of oligarchy; of free labor against the lordship over slaves; of the great industrial people against all the expiring aristocracies of which any remnants had tided down from the Middle Age. He was of a religious turn of mind, without superstition; and the unbroken faith of the mass was like his own. As he went along through his difficult journey, sounding his way, he held fast by the hand of the people, and "tracked its footsteps with even feet." "His pulse's beat twinned with their pulses." He committed faults; but the people were resolutely generous, magnanimous and forgiving; and he in his turn was willing to take instructions from their wisdom.

The measure by which Abraham Lincoln takes his place, not in American history only, but in universal history, is his Proclamation of January 1, 1863, emancipating all slaves within the insurgent States. It was, indeed, a military necessity, and it decided the result of the war. It took from the public enemy one or two millions of bondsmen, and placed between one and two hundred thousand brave and gallant troops in arms on the side of the Union. A great deal has been said in time past of the wonderful results of the toil of the enslaved negro in the creation of wealth by the culture of cotton; and now it is in part to the aid of the negro in freedom that the country owes its success in its movement of regeneration—that the world of mankind owes the continuance of the United States as the example of a Republic. The death of President Lincoln sets the seal to that Proclamation, which must be maintained. It cannot but be maintained. It is the only rod that can safely carry off the thunderbolt. He came to it perhaps reluctantly; he was brought to adopt it, as it were, against his will, but compelled by inevitable necessity. He disclaimed all praise for the act, saying reverently, after it had succeeded, "The nation's condition God alone can claim."

And what a futurity is opened up before the country when its institutions become homogeneous! From all the civilized world the nations will send hosts to share the wealth and glory of this people. It will receive all good ideas from abroad; and its great principles of personal equality and freedom—freedom of conscience and mind—freedom of speech and action—freedom of government through ever-renewed common consent, will undulate through the world like the rays of light and heat from the sun. With one wing touching the waters of the Atlantic and the other on the Pacific, it will grow into a greatness of which the past has no parallel; and there can be no spot in Europe or in Asia so remote or so secluded as to shut out its influence.—Atlantic Monthly.

A MOUTHFUL FOR TOBACCO LOVERS.

Tobacco is extremely adulterated with dried dock leaves, browned, as in the case of tobacco itself, by sulphate of iron and cascarilla, for the purpose of giving it flavor. Nitrate of potash is added, to make tobacco in form of cigars kindle readily; but it is injurious to the lungs. Other metallic substances are often found mixed with tobacco, such as antimony, bichloride of mercury, copper, liquorice, hellebore. Tobacco in the form of snuff is adulterated still more largely.—Chemical Times.

Tobacco is one of the most powerful and deadly poisons in the vegetable kingdom. Its poisonous effects on the living tissues of the animal system are always to destroy life, as the experiments made on pigeons, cats, and other animals, sufficiently prove.—Professor Graham.

However used, whether smoked, chewed or snuffed, its action on the system is but little different. It is essentially a narcotic; and as such, it is detrimental to the power and healthiness of the nervous system—as such, it stimulates at the expense of subsequent depression and eventual loss of tone—as such, it interferes with the functions of assimilation and expenditure—and as such, is injurious to the health of the whole system.—Dr. Robertson on Diet and Regimen.

There are two principles of activity in tobacco, an essential oil, and a peculiar proximate principle called nicotin, both of which are capable of producing death, but by different physiological action; the former by its effects on the brain, the latter by its influence over the heart. The essential oil is so virulent a poison, that small animals are almost instantly killed when wounded by a needle dipped in it, or when a few drops of it are let fall upon their tongue. That the regular application in this way of a poison of such power, perhaps for five or six times daily, for months or years together, should at length be productive of serious effects on the nervous system, and especially on the brain, cannot surely be a matter of doubt. Indeed, it would be surprising if it were otherwise.—Dr. Mackenzie, Surgeon-Oculist to her Majesty.

The severe and peculiar dyspeptic symptoms sometimes produced by inveterate snuff-taking are well known; and I have more than once seen such cases terminate fatally with malignant disease of the stomach and liver. .... Surely if the dictates of reason were allowed to prevail, an article so injurious to health, and so offensive in all its forms and modes of enjoyment, would speedily be banished from common use.—Dr. Prout.

I wonder physicians keep silent as they do. The American community is full of the victims of tobacco. It is hardly less fatal than its grand associate, rum. They are true fellow-workers in poisoning the instincts, destroying the health, and degrading the nature of man. —Dr. Beman.

Tobacco smoking feeds the love of strong drink in two ways. First, by creating morbid thirst; secondly, by impairing the appetite for food, and indirectly encouraging him who uses it to seek for that strength which food should give him, in the use of extra stimulus.—Dr. Alcot.

I group alcohol, opium and tobacco together, being equally poisonous, alike to be rejected, because they agree in their effects, producing stupor and insensibility.—Professor Hitchcock.

The amount of intemperance arising from this cause, if followed to its actual issues, would be truly startling. One writer on the subject is of opinion that it would amount to no less than one tenth of the drunkards annually made throughout the nation. The practice is, beyond all doubt, a fruitful source of intemperance, and ought, therefore, to be disused by every one who regards the welfare and happiness of either himself or his fellow-creatures.—Dr. Grindrod.

It would seem by the foregoing as if tobacco was a very useless weed, and very pernicious in its effects: but to comfort the lovers of it we can assure them it is invaluable for one thing. "What is that?" we hear an anxious inquirer ask. Well, we will tell you. It is one of the best things in the world to kill sheep-ticks. When we were young our father kept a large flock of sheep. At shearing time it was found they were tormented with ticks. The long wool being removed the ticks "changed front" and by a "flank movement" took possession of the lambs. Our father directed us to boil up some tobacco, and filling a tub with this liquid we took the lambs by their four legs and dipped them all over in it except their noses. The ticks died suddenly. A large portion of tobacco users look as if it would not be long before they would be companions of the sheep-ticks.

A London paper calls attention to the fact that "the year 1866, which Louis Napoleon has fixed on as the time for withdrawing his troops from Rome—which will be virtually leaving the papacy in that city to its fate—is the very year which nearly all our most eminent commentators on the New Testament and writers on prophecy, from the time of Bishop Newton downward, have by a wonderful concurrence of opinion, named as the year in which Popery is to receive its death blow."

Do Christ this one favor, for all his love to thee: love all his saints; even the poorest, the meanest, and the weakest, notwithstanding some slight differences in judgment. As the names of the children of Israel were graven on Aaron's breast-plate, so are the names of all God's saints engraven on the heart of Christ. Let them be likewise so on thine.—Wilcox.

WHO AND WHAT ARE ANGELS?

The term "angel" is from "angelos," and signifies "to tell," "to deliver a message," "a messenger." The connection and circumstances must determine the nature of the messenger.

Men are sometimes called angels; but when the term is so applied it always indicates their office as messengers. It is, therefore, to men, an official title. There are numerous instances of this title being applied to men. See Rev. i. 20, and ii. 1, 8, 12, 18, and iii. 1, 7, 14. In most instances, however, our translators have very properly translated the term, "messenger." See Math. xi. 10, "angelon." See also 2 Corth. xii. 7. "A thorn in the flesh, the messenger [angelos] of Satan to buffet me," &c. This messenger was, doubtless, the false teacher of which the apostle speaks in the previous chapters. "His letters, say they, are weighty and powerful, but his bodily presence is weak, and his speech contemptible." At the 13th verse, chapter xi. the apostle says: "Such are false apostles, deceitful workers, transforming themselves into apostles of Christ. And no marvel; for Satan himself is transformed into an angel [angelon] of light, [or puts on the appearance of an angel of light.] Therefore it is no great thing if his ministers also be transformed as the ministers of righteousness." See also Luke vii. 24, and ix. 52, and James ii. 25.

But the Scriptures teach that the term angel is applied to an order of beings who are not, and never were men, that is, of Adam's race. See Heb. i. 13, 14: "But to which of the angels said he at any time, sit on my right hand, until I make thine enemies thy footstool? Are they not all ministering spirits, sent forth to minister for them who shall be heirs of salvation?" See also Heb. ii. 16: "For verily he took not on him the nature of angels; but he took on him the seed of Abraham." This text, it appears to us, shows conclusively that there is an order of beings who are not and never were decendants of Adam; whose nature Christ took not on him, or, as the margin reads, "took not hold of," consequently they did not belong to the posterity of Adam. One of these angels appeared to Manoah and his wife: see Judges xiii. At first they supposed him to be merely "a man of God;" but when he "ascended in the flame of the altar" then they "fell on their faces to the ground;" and then they "knew that he was an angel of the Lord;" and "Manoah said unto his wife, We shall surely die, because we have seen God." Observe here, that to see an angel, or the angel of the Lord, is said to be seeing God.

Angels, as an order of beings, are one in nature, but various in rank.

The Lord Jesus Christ is not an angel, in nature, of any order or rank. See Heb. i. 4–8, "Being made so much better than the angels, as he hath by inheritance obtained a more excellent name than they. For unto which of the angels said he at any time, Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee? And again, I will be to him a Father, and he shall be to me a Son. And again, when he bringeth in the first begotten into the world, he saith, And let all the angels of God worship him. And of the angels he saith, Who maketh his angels spirits, and his ministers a flame of fire. But unto the Son, he saith, Thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever: a sceptre of righteousness is the sceptre of thy kingdom."

Here, if we do not mistake, the apostle affirms that God never said to an angel, of any order, "Thou art my Son;" again, he declares that the Son is "much better than the angels;" and again, "Let all the angels of God worship him:" all of which expressions show that he, himself, is not an angel in nature. In the 13th verse the apostle uses this language—"To which of the angels said he at any time, Sit on my right hand, until I make thine enemies thy footstool?" That is, God never said this to an angel; therefore, the Son of God is not an angel, for God did say this to his Son.

Again, chapter ii. 5, Paul says—"Unto the gels hath he not put in subjection the world, [age, or dispensation] to come, whereof we speak;" and verse 8, he says—"For in that he put all in subjection under him: but now we see not yet all things put under him: but we see Jesus, who was made a little lower than the angels," &c.

Here, if we mistake not, we have the fact that he who is made of God the head of "the world [or age] to come," is not an angel; and that though he was higher and better than the angels, yet, to prepare him to be the head and "father of the everlasting age" he was made, for a while, "a little lower than the angels;" but now having "suffered death," he is to be "crowned with glory and honor." The 16th verse, already quoted, expressly declares, that "he took not on him the nature of angels;" which language could have little force if he were in nature an angel of any order.

Once more: Our Lord, himself, when speaking of certain events to take place, Mark xiii. 32, says—"Of that day and hour knoweth no man, no, not the angels which are in heaven, neither the Son," &c. Here he clearly distinguishes himself from the angels; and the form of expression shows that he places himself in a higher scale than the angels, and superior to them. These texts are sufficient to show that our Lord is not, and never was an angel in his nature: therefore he is not "The angel of the Lord" spoken in the Scriptures. That angel is evidently one in nature, and a distinct being from our Lord. In proof of this see Lk. ii. 9–11. Here it is expressly said—"The angel of Lord" proclaimed to the shepherds, saying—"Behold I bring you good tidings—for unto you is born this day a Saviour, which is Christ the Lord." Here the distinction between "the angel of the Lord," and our Lord Jesus Christ is demonstrated; also, in Matt. ii. 13, the distinction is equally marked—"The angel of the Lord appeared to Joseph in a dream, saying, arise and take the young child [Jesus] and his mother and flee into Egypt," &c. The same distinction is observed in Math. xxviii. 2. "The angel of the Lord descended from heaven, and came and rolled back the stone from the door [of Jesus's sepulchre] and sat upon it," &c. At the 5th verse, it is said, this "angel answered and said unto the women, [who came to the sepulchre,] Fear not ye: for I know that ye seek Jesus—he is not here," &c. But, "the angel of the Lord" was there, and spake to the women: therefore, Jesus is not "the angel of the Lord." He may be called an angel in the sense of being a messenger, but that does not make him such in nature.

Such being the fact, it seems clear that the common notion on this subject is an error; and it has led to many other errors. It has made men lose sight of the ministration of angels. They seem to suppose that whatever is done on earth, God or his Son must do personally; thus stripping them of the glory they would give to any earthly king or governor: that of saying to one go, and he goeth; and to his servant do this, and he doeth it. No, they make the Almighty and his Son Jesus Christ to serve personally, as though God were incapable of constituting an order of beings with power, or understanding sufficient to manage the affairs of this province of his dominions, [this globe,] in this age or dispensation. The Scriptures teach us that God has, and does now, in this age, manage the affairs of this world, directly by the ministration of angels.

Let us look at a few texts. Gal. iii. 19, "Wherefore then serveth the law? It was added because of transgressions, till the seed should come to whom the promise was made: and it was ordained by angels in the hand of a mediator." Here the apostle assures us that the law itself was ordained, i. e. introduced, or given by angels. We shall be further satisfied of this by turning to Acts vii. 53, where "Stephen, full of the Holy Spirit," says of the people of Israel, "Who have received the law by the disposition [or ministration] of angels, and have not kept it." Compare this again with Heb. ii. 2—"For if the word spoken by angels was steadfast, and every transgression and disobedience received a just recompense of reward; how shall we escape if we neglect so great salvation; which at the first began to be spoken by the Lord" Jesus, &c. Here the apostle makes a clear distinction between Christ and angels: the angels communicating the law, with all its awful sanctions, and our Lord Jesus Christ bringing in the Gospel, with all its glorious mercy.

Stephen further informs us, Acts vii. 38, speaking of Moses, he says, "This is he, that was in the church [congregation] in the wilderness, with the angel which spake to him in mount Sinai, and with our fathers; who received the lively oracles to give unto us," &c. Here we have the same truth as repeated by Paul and reiterated by Stephen, at the 58th verse, that the law was given by the ministration of angels, a principal one among them being the chief speaker: that angel being the one who had special charge of the posterity of Jacob, and acted as Jehovah's agent in all that related to that people; and still he was but an angel and not Jehovah himself, nor his Son, acting personally. Even the Son of God himself, while here upon earth, was ministered unto by angels: see Math. iv. 6, 11; Lk. xxii. 43, "And there appeared an angel unto him from heaven, strengthening him." If then our Lord himself was ministered unto by angels, shall we think it strange if God has ever employed angels in making communications to men, and in managing the affairs of the world? The present world and its affairs are managed by the ministration of angels, so to speak, as agents—officers—"princes," &c.; but the next age, or "world to come," is to be under the direct and personal agency of the Son of God: Heb. ii. 5. Some of the angels have the name of God upon them: thus, Gabriel signifies, "Strengh of God," or "My strong God," &c., Michael signifies, "Who is like God."

THOUGHTS ON 1 PETER I. 1–5.

"Wherefore laying aside all malice, and all guile, and hypocrisies, and envies, and all evil-speakings, as new-born babes, desire the sincere milk of the word, that you may grow thereby: if so be ye have tasted that the Lord is gracious. To whom coming unto a living stone, disallowed indeed of men, but chosen of God, and precious, Ye also as lively stones, are built up a spiritual house, an holy priesthood to offer up spiritual sacrifices, acceptable to God by Jesus Christ."

"Wherefore"—because you have presented to you an incorruptible inheritance to be brought unto you at the revelation of Jesus Christ, in the hope of which you now rejoice—and seeing you have been delivered from your former course of life, wherein you were in ignorance of God's grand intention to bestow that glorious inheritance upon such as should be holy and blameless in love—and seeing, by the incorruptible word of God ye have been begotten again to a lively hope, therefore—"laying aside"—apothemenoi—lay off, renounce with aversion, abstain from—"all malice"—kakian—from kakos; which signifies not only malice, wickedness, but cowardice. Those who have such hopes, as previously described, should not count even their lives dear unto them, nor any suffering, or reproach too much to endure, that they may honor the author of these glorious hopes; in a word let them lay aside all cowardice or timidity, and trust in that God who raised up Christ from the dead; thus going forward let them also put off "all guile"—trickery, deception, fraud, falsehood—"and all hypocrisies"—dissimulations, false pretensions—"and all envies"—jealousy, spite, hatred, grudging; from phtheo, to pine; because the person who has this spirit pines at any prosperity of those towards whom he indulges it; "put it off," says Peter—cast it away from you we renounce it with abhorrence—"and all evil speaking"—back-biting, detraction. Envy is a lurking serpent in the bosom of him who holds it; it pines for food; and evil speaking, detraction, is the nourishment by which it lives. Deprive it of this food, and it dies.

When therefore we see or hear persons speaking evil of others, and striving to injure them we know the lurking serpent is in their hearts; they are to be pitied more than the object of their detraction; because the serpent thus nourished will ultimately sting them to death; therefore put it away, and make no delay in doing so; and "as new-born babes"—or, as babes just born, "desire, earnestly desire, long for—the sincere"—pure unmixed, unadulterated—"milk of the word." This is the true nourishment of that spiritual nature, when it first develops itself; and without which it cannot live, much less can it grow. The pure, unadulterated word is that which God has appointed to nourish, strengthen and bring forward that new development in man. Let all understand this; and let these tender ones, who have just been brought to the commencement of this new life, desire—earnestly desire—this nourishment, that they may "grow"—flourish, prosper, enlarge—"thereby, if so be"—since—"ye have tasted that the Lord is gracious;" having begun in the spiritual life let us increase and strengthen it; and in order thereto, take that nourishment which is adapted to our state and condition; and especially beware of that food which nourishes the serpent—envy.

"To whom coming"—that is, spiritually, by this new nature as naturally drawn to Christ as the new-born babe turns to its mother for that nourishment which she alone can give. But the figure is now changed, and Christ the Lord is presented as "a living stone"—a stone in which there is life—a stone that enlivens, revives, reanimates, causes to live all that come to it and build upon it—"disallowed"—rejected, disapproved, thrown aside as worthless—"of men;" first of the Jews as a people; since that by all men who give themselves up to follow the leading of their animal nature; or who seek nothing more than mere intellectual enjoyments. These last professing themselves wise become fools, and prefer to drink water out of their own broken cisterns, to being dependent upon Christ for the water of life; or to keep to the figure in the text, they choose to build on the sand rather than to be dependent upon that stone, or rock, Christ Jesus. Though thus thrown aside as worthless by men, he is "chosen"—selected "of God."

Here, then, is the whole controversy now between God and men. God made choice of, approved and accepted His Son, Jesus Christ, to be the head of the spiritual creation, or foundation of all immortality, incorruptiblity, and endless life. With this choice God is well pleased; and in his sight this foundation stone is "precious"—honorable, highly esteemed, costly; but men are dissatisfied with it, and cast it aside as worthless: the wisdom of God has devised it; men account it folly: God's purpose is, that salvation, immortality, incorruptibility, endless life shall be attained in no other way; and all the efforts of men to arrive at these blessings by any other means are as fruitless as the attempt at Babylon to build a tower up to heaven; and the confusion of language at the time of that folly, was no greater than the vexations that men now inflict on themselves in endeavoring to "be as Gods;" or, to be immortal without Christ.

The purpose of God is unchangeable; eternal life is given to us in Christ, and no where else; so that he who continues to contest the case with God will as surely perish forever—utterly and totally perish, and "be as though he had not been"—as God is more mighty than man. On the other hand they, who submit to God's choice become "as lively stones."—stones having life, by their connection with the foundation, and "are built up a spiritual house"—dwelling, mansion, a house of God, temple, a temple of the Holy Spirit—"a holy priest-hood to offer up spiritual sacrifices" instead of those animal sacrifices offered under the law; and still offered in another form, by many under the gospel; who it is to be feared, being ignorant of the spiritual character of the offerings God requires, think to please him with an animal excitement, which they mistake for "spiritual sacrifices;" but the latter only are "acceptable"—grateful, pleasing—"to God, by"—through, on account of—"Jesus Christ."

INSPIRATION OF THE BIBLE.

Nothing is gained to the cause of truth by insisting that everything that is recorded in the Bible was given by direct inspiration from God. Such a pretention is one thing that has helped to make Infidels. By rejecting such a claim the Deists in the Hartford Convention of 1853 were defeated. We took the ground, in opposing them, substantially, presented by Bishop Watson in his "Apology for the Bible," in reply to Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason," published in 1799. Watson was Bishop of Landaff, and Professor of Divinity in Cambridge University, so that he ought to have known what the Christians of his day did or did not believe concerning the Bible. In reply to Paine's harsh strictures on the Book of Rruth, he observes:

"Pretty stuff, indeed," you exclaim, "to be called the Word of God!" It seems to me that you do not perfectly comprehend what is meant by the expression—the Word of God—or the divine authority of the Scriptures. I will explain it to you in the words of Dr. Law, late Bishop of Carlisle, and in those of St. Austin. My first quotation is from Bishop Law's Theory of Religion, a book not undeserving your notice:

"The true sense, then, of the divine authority of the books of the Old Testament, and which, perhaps, is enough to denominate them in general divinely inspired, seems to be this: that as in those times God has all along, besides the inspection or superintendency of his general providence, interfered upon particular occasions by giving express commissions to some persons (thence called prophets) to declare his will in various manners, and degrees of evidence, as best suited the occasion, time, and nature of the subject; and in all other cases left them wholly to themselves; in like manner, he has interposed his more immediate assistance, and notified it to them, (as they did to the world,) in the recording of these revelations; so far as that was necessary, amid the common, (but from hence termed sacred) history of those times, and mixed with various other occurrences, in which the historian's own natural qualifications were sufficient to enable him to relate things with all the accuracy they required."

The passage from St. Austin is this: "I am of opinion that those men to whom the Holy Ghost revealed what ought to be received as authoritative in religion, might write some things as men with historical diligence, and other things as prophets by divine inspiration, that the former may be attributed to themselves as contributing to the increase of knowledge, and the latter to God speaking by them things appertaining to the authority of religion."

Whether this opinion be right or wrong, I do not here inquire; it is the opinion of many learned men and good Christians; and if you will adopt it as your opinion, you will see cause, perhaps to become a Christian yourself; you will see cause to consider chronological, geographical, or geneological errors—apparent mistakes or real contradictions as to historical facts—needless repetitions and trifling interpolations—indeed you will see cause to consider all the principal objections of your book to be absolutely without foundation. Receive but the Bible as composed by upright and well informed, though in some respects, fallible men, (for I exclude all fallibility when they profess to deliver the word of God), and you must receive it as a book revealing to you, in many parts, the express will of God; and in other parts, relating to you the ordinary history of the times.

Give but the authors of the Bible that credit which you give to other historians; believe them to deliverthe word of God, when they tell you they do so; believe when they relate other things as of themselves, and not of the Lord, that they wrote to the best of their knowledge and capacity; and you will be in your belief something very different from a deist; you may not be allowed to aspire to the character of an orthodox believer, but you will not be an unbeliever in the divine authority of the Bible; though you should admit human mistakes and human opinions to exist in some parts of it. This I take to be the first step toward the removal of the doubts of many skeptical men; and when they are advanced thus far, the grace of God, assisting a teachable disposition, and a pious intention, may carry them on to perfection.

CATHOLOCISM: WHAT IS IT?

Let the following, which shows the "cloven foot," testify as to its true character. The Shepherd of the Valley, published under the eye and professing to speak with the approbation of the Catholic Bishop of St. Louis, a few years since gave vent to such sentiments as these:

"The Church, we admit, is of necessity intolerant; that is, she does every thing in her power to check, as effectually as circumstances will admit, the progress of crime and error. Her intolerance follows necessarily from her claim to infallibility; she alone has the right to be intolerant. Heresy she inserts in her catalogue of mortal sins; she endures it when and where she must; but she hates it, and directs all her energy to effect its destruction. If the Catholics ever gain, which they surely will do, though at a distant day, an immense numerical majority religious freedom in this country is at an end. So say our enemies. So we believe.

"We gain nothing by declaring so earnestly against the doctrine of civil punishment of spiritual crimes. Our enemies will not believe that we are better than our church, and—for her—her history is before them; they know what she sanctioned during the middle ages, what she did then, and does now where she can; they know, too, what they would do, were they in power; they judge us by themselves. They can reason besides, and when we say two and two, they will add, make four, whatever we can do to stop them. Heresy is a mortal sin, kills the soul, and sends the entire man, body and soul, to hell; it is, besides, a contagious disease, and affects the interests of unborn millions. Christian kings, believing this, will crush it in the shell. Christian States, knowing this, will drive it from their bodies when they can.

"We will say, however, that we are not in favor of roasting heretics, and that, if this sort of work is to be revived—though in our miserable times it is quite impossible, since men have no belief which they care to propagate, or for which they dare endure—if persecution is to be renewed, we would rather be its victims than its agents; but we are not, therefore, going to deny the facts of history, or to blame the Saints of God or the Pastors of the Church for what they have done and sanctioned. We say that the temporal punishment of heresy is a mere question of expediency; that Protestants do not persecute us here, simply because they have not the power; and that where we abstain from persecuting them, they are well aware that it is merely because we cannot do so, or think that, by doing so, we should injure the cause we wish to serve."

Such is the spirit of all sectarianism, wherever it is found. No worse in one class of men than in another; nor will it die till Christ the Restorer returns from heaven. But the foregoing language shows what we have often said, that Romanism seeks the civil power in this country, and means to hurl it against all religion but its own. Let us all beware of receiving the mark of this beast; for their fate is to "drink of the vials of God's wrath, poured out without mixture."

The following, communicated to the Times by "An English Clergyman," of recent date, shows the intolerance and bigotry of Popery where it possesses power. The writer says:

"I am an English clergyman. In traveling in the North of Spain a few weeks since, I proposed to pass a Sunday in a town where I ascertained that many English families resided, principally connected with the railway now in progress. On making inquiry, I found that during two years, in which many of them had resided there, they had only on two occasions received a visit from an English clergyman, and had not once had an opportunity of receiving the Holy Sacrament. An English gentleman, much interested in the welfare of his countrymen, gladly offered me the use of a room in his own house, and gave information by private notes sent to the different English families. On Sunday morning a very respectable and attentive congregation of thirty or forty persons was assembled, and about fifteen received at Sacrament. But it appears that so simple and unostentatious a religious act is not to be permitted in Spain. Two days afterwards the Alcalde of the town sent an official communication, of which a translation is subjoined, to the master of the house in which the service was held:

"Inasmuch as it has come to my knowledge, that, on Sunday, there was held in your house a meeting, at which were practised religious ceremonies belonging to the Protestant mode of worship which you profess, conducted by a minister of that sect; and, insomuch as in this nation there are not tolerated nor permitted ceremonies of any religion than that of the Catholic Apostolic Roman Church, I address myself to you, Sir, in order that, as a master of your house, you may avoid the repetition of acts, which, besides being opposed to our religious faith, have, by the publicity and impudence with which they have been done, attracted the attentian of this neighborhood. It being well understood that if the warning which you hereby receive is not sufficient to prohibit such acts either in your house or in the house of any other British subject, I shall have recourse to the means which are in my power to repress such a scandalous abuse, and to punish whatever leads to such a culpable result."

MORE FABLES.

"The Creator has given us these bodies to be our habitation—a dwelling adapted to our highest comfort and welfare. Our individual identity does not consist in the body. The body is not the man. The man is really an invisible being; and his body is the house in which he lives. The eye is no part of man; it is only the window of the house through which he looks out upon the world. The ear is no part of man; it is only the earthly medium through which sound is conveyed to the dweller within. When the house decays he will live elsewhere. It is now a habitation fitted up by the Creator, of which he should be a faithful steward and tenant, till called hence to give an account. But if he wantonly destroy that dwelling, suddenly or gradually, by setting it on fire, to enjoy the splendor of the flames, or the grandeur of the lighted clouds of smoke, or by gradually digging away the foundation on which the vital structure is based, he stands charged with the crime of suicide before heaven, and must answer to it in the day of judgment."

Br. Storrs—The foregoing is extracted from a physiological work containing much useful information, and compiled with more than ordinary ability. I was strnck with the inconsistency and falsity of this position, and exclaimed in the language of holy writ—"Great men are not always wise." How strange, surpassingly strange, that such a dogma is so universally believed, even by those of superior talent and learning; and who, upon other points, are capable of sound reasoniug and discernment! Alas! "That old serpent" has wound his coils around the human mind, and fastened them so strongly, that it seems almost impossible they should ever be unloosed. The main point of his deception is to lead men to believe that they are something more than what they really are—and thus cause them to be "lifted up with pride," and fall into the same "condemnation," into which he has fallen. Herein lay the force of the temptation in Eden. "Ye are something more than human beings," said this great deceiver; "even immortal—and when ye have tasted the forbidden fruit your eyes will be opened to discern your exalted state—ah ye shall be as gods—or the Elohim—angels." Such was his assertion; and though nearly six thousand years have elapsed, he is still in the same subtle way proclaiming it, and constantly gaining victims to the deception.

There is one point in the extract to which I wished particularly to draw attention. It is this—That if man destroys in any way the dwelling or habitation wherein the part constituting his identity lives, he stands charged with the crime of suicide before heaven, and must accordingly give account. Now let us see if this is logical. What is the crime of suicide? It is self-murder, or the act of destroying one's self. But the author has stated in so many words, that "The body is not the man," but that "the man is an invisible being within." Then, of course, the body is not himself, and if he merely destroys the habitation containing himself, how can it be suicide? That invisible part, constituting the man, according to the same philosophy, cannot be destroyed. It is immortal—imperishable. I unhesitatingly affirm then—that in accordance with this mode of reasoning, No man can kill himself: that the crime of suicide never has been, and never can be committed—and therefore should be blotted out of the catalogue.

Now I leave it to the intelligent mind to say whether this is not the more logical deduction from such premises. Surely, all will assent to it. But reason, common sense, and the Bible have all given way before this false philosophy; and yet the great mass see not its absurdity.

Strange, indeed, that the Bible makes the mere dwelling of man of so much importance, and regards so little the "invisible man" himself! Even the gospel hope is based wholly upon the resurrection of this "habitation"! The apostles devoted their entire energies to the preaching of "Jesus and the resurrection of the dead." Yes, he desired to have his "habitation" quickened by the Spirit of God, and live eternally. Why, O why beloved apostle, didst thou not say something about

WHO AND WHAT ARE ANGELS?

The term "angel" is from "angelos," and signifies "to tell," "to deliver a message," "a messenger." The connection and circumstances must determine the nature of the messenger.

Men are sometimes called angels; but when the term is so applied it always indicates their office as messengers. It is, therefore, to men, an official title. There are numerous instances of this title being applied to men. See Rev. i. 20, and ii. 1, 8, 12, 18, and iii. 1, 7, 14. In most instances, however, our translators have very properly translated the term, "messenger." See Math. xi. 10, "angelon." See also 2 Corth. xii. 7. "A thorn in the flesh, the messenger [angelos] of Satan to buffet me," &c. This messenger was, doubtless, the false teacher of which the apostle speaks in the previous chapters. "His letters, say they, are weighty and powerful, but his bodily presence is weak, and his speech contemptible." At the 13th verse, chapter xi. the apostle says: "Such are false apostles, deceitful workers, transforming themselves into apostles of Christ. And no marvel; for Satan himself is transformed into an angel [angelon] of light, [or puts on the appearance of an angel of light.] Therefore it is no great thing if his ministers also be transformed as the ministers of righteousness." See also Luke vii. 24, and ix. 52, and James ii. 25.

But the Scriptures teach that the term angel is applied to an order of beings who are not, and never were men, that is, of Adam's race. See Heb. i. 13, 14: "But to which of the angels said he at any time, sit on my right hand, until I make thine enemies thy footstool? Are they not all ministering spirits, sent forth to minister for them who shall be heirs of salvation?" See also Heb. ii. 16: "For verily he took not on him the nature of angels; but he took on him the seed of Abraham." This text, it appears to us, shows conclusively that there is an order of beings who are not and never were decendants of Adam; whose nature Christ took not on him, or, as the margin reads, "took not hold of," consequently they did not belong to the posterity of Adam. One of these angels appeared to Manoah and his wife: see Judges xiii. At first they supposed him to be merely "a man of God;" but when he "ascended in the flame of the altar" then they "fell on their faces to the ground;" and then they "knew that he was an angel of the Lord;" and "Manoah said unto his wife, We shall surely die, because we have seen God." Observe here, that to see an angel, or the angel of the Lord, is said to be seeing God.

Angels, as an order of beings, are one in nature, but various in rank.

The Lord Jesus Christ is not an angel, in nature, of any order or rank. See Heb. i. 4–8, "Being made so much better than the angels, as he hath by inheritance obtained a more excellent name than they. For unto which of the angels said he at any time, Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee? And again, I will be to him a Father, and he shall be to me a Son. And again, when he bringeth in the first begotten into the world, he saith, And let all the angels of God worship him. And of the angels he saith, Who maketh his angels spirits, and his ministers a flame of fire. But unto the Son, he saith, Thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever: a sceptre of righteousness is the sceptre of thy kingdom."

Here, if we do not mistake, the apostle affirms that God never said to an angel, of any order, "Thou art my Son;" again, he declares that the Son is "much better than the angels;" and again, "Let all the angels of God worship him:" all of which expressions show that he, himself, is not an angel in nature. In the 13th verse the apostle uses this language—"To which of the angels said he at any time, Sit on my right hand, until I make thine enemies thy footstool?" That is, God never said this to an angel; therefore, the Son of God is not an angel, for God did say this to his Son.

Again, chapter ii. 5, Paul says—"Unto the gels hath he not put in subjection the world, [age, or dispensation] to come, whereof we speak;" and verse 8, he says—"For in that he put all in subjection under him: but now we see not yet all things put under him: but we see Jesus, who was made a little lower than the angels," &c.

Here, if we mistake not, we have the fact that he who is made of God the head of "the world [or age] to come," is not an angel; and that though he was higher and better than the angels, yet, to prepare him to be the head and "father of the everlasting age" he was made, for a while, "a little lower than the angels;" but now having "suffered death," he is to be "crowned with glory and honor." The 16th verse, already quoted, expressly declares, that "he took not on him the nature of angels;" which language could have little force if he were in nature an angel of any order.

Once more: Our Lord, himself, when speaking of certain events to take place, Mark xiii. 32, says—"Of that day and hour knoweth no man, no, not the angels which are in heaven, neither the Son," &c. Here he clearly distinguishes himself from the angels; and the form of expression shows that he places himself in a higher scale than the angels, and superior to them. These texts are sufficient to show that our Lord is not, and never was an angel in his nature: therefore he is not "The angel of the Lord" spoken in the Scriptures. That angel is evidently one in nature, and a distinct being from our Lord. In proof of this see Lk. ii. 9–11. Here it is expressly said—"The angel of Lord" proclaimed to the shepherds, saying—"Behold I bring you good tidings—for unto you is born this day a Saviour, which is Christ the Lord." Here the distinction between "the angel of the Lord," and our Lord Jesus Christ is demonstrated; also, in Matt. ii. 13, the distinction is equally marked—"The angel of the Lord appeared to Joseph in a dream, saying, arise and take the young child [Jesus] and his mother and flee into Egypt," &c. The same distinction is observed in Math. xxviii. 2. "The angel of the Lord descended from heaven, and came and rolled back the stone from the door [of Jesus's sepulchre] and sat upon it," &c. At the 5th verse, it is said, this "angel answered and said unto the women, [who came to the sepulchre,] Fear not ye: for I know that ye seek Jesus—he is not here," &c. But, "the angel of the Lord" was there, and spake to the women: therefore, Jesus is not "the angel of the Lord." He may be called an angel in the sense of being a messenger, but that does not make him such in nature.

Such being the fact, it seems clear that the common notion on this subject is an error; and it has led to many other errors. It has made men lose sight of the ministration of angels. They seem to suppose that whatever is done on earth, God or his Son must do personally; thus stripping them of the glory they would give to any earthly king or governor: that of saying to one go, and he goeth; and to his servant do this, and he doeth it. No, they make the Almighty and his Son Jesus Christ to serve personally, as though God were incapable of constituting an order of beings with power, or understanding sufficient to manage the affairs of this province of his dominions, [this globe,] in this age or dispensation. The Scriptures teach us that God has, and does now, in this age, manage the affairs of this world, directly by the ministration of angels.

Let us look at a few texts. Gal. iii. 19, "Wherefore then serveth the law? It was added because of transgressions, till the seed should come to whom the promise was made: and it was ordained by angels in the hand of a mediator." Here the apostle assures us that the law itself was ordained, i. e. introduced, or given by angels. We shall be further satisfied of this by turning to Acts vii. 53, where "Stephen, full of the Holy Spirit," says of the people of Israel, "Who have received the law by the disposition [or ministration] of angels, and have not kept it." Compare this again with Heb. ii. 2—"For if the word spoken by angels was steadfast, and every transgression and disobedience received a just recompense of reward; how shall we escape if we neglect so great salvation; which at the first began to be spoken by the Lord" Jesus, &c. Here the apostle makes a clear distinction between Christ and angels: the angels communicating the law, with all its awful sanctions, and our Lord Jesus Christ bringing in the Gospel, with all its glorious mercy.

Stephen further informs us, Acts vii. 38, speaking of Moses, he says, "This is he, that was in the church [congregation] in the wilderness, with the angel which spake to him in mount Sinai, and with our fathers; who received the lively oracles to give unto us," &c. Here we have the same truth as repeated by Paul and reiterated by Stephen, at the 58th verse, that the law was given by the ministration of angels, a principal one among them being the chief speaker: that angel being the one who had special charge of the posterity of Jacob, and acted as Jehovah's agent in all that related to that people; and still he was but an angel and not Jehovah himself, nor his Son, acting personally. Even the Son of God himself, while here upon earth, was ministered unto by angels: see Math. iv. 6, 11; Lk. xxii. 43, "And there appeared an angel unto him from heaven, strengthening him." If then our Lord himself was ministered unto by angels, shall we think it strange if God has ever employed angels in making communications to men, and in managing the affairs of the world? The present world and its affairs are managed by the ministration of angels, so to speak, as agents—officers—"princes," &c.; but the next age, or "world to come," is to be under the direct and personal agency of the Son of God: Heb. ii. 5. Some of the angels have the name of God upon them: thus, Gabriel signifies, "Strengh of God," or "My strong God," &c., Michael signifies, "Who is like God."

THOUGHTS ON 1 PETER I. 1–5.

"Wherefore laying aside all malice, and all guile, and hypocrisies, and envies, and all evil-speakings, as new-born babes, desire the sincere milk of the word, that you may grow thereby: if so be ye have tasted that the Lord is gracious. To whom coming unto a living stone, disallowed indeed of men, but chosen of God, and precious, Ye also as lively stones, are built up a spiritual house, an holy priesthood to offer up spiritual sacrifices, acceptable to God by Jesus Christ."

"Wherefore"—because you have presented to you an incorruptible inheritance to be brought unto you at the revelation of Jesus Christ, in the hope of which you now rejoice—and seeing you have been delivered from your former course of life, wherein you were in ignorance of God's grand intention to bestow that glorious inheritance upon such as should be holy and blameless in love—and seeing, by the incorruptible word of God ye have been begotten again to a lively hope, therefore— "laying aside" —apothemenoi—lay off, renounce with aversion, abstain from—"all malice"—kakian—from kakos; which signifies not only malice, wickedness, but cowardice. Those who have such hopes, as previously described, should not count even their lives dear unto them, nor any suffering, or reproach too much to endure, that they may honor the author of these glorious hopes; in a word let them lay aside all cowardice or timidity, and trust in that God who raised up Christ from the dead; thus going forward let them also put off "all guile"—trickery, deception, fraud, falsehood—"and all hypocrisies"—dissimulations, false pretensions—"and all envies"—jealousy, spite, hatred, grudging; from phtheo, to pine; because the person who has this spirit pines at any prosperity of those towards whom he indulges it; "put it off," says Peter—cast it away from you we renounce it with abhorrence—"and all evil speaking"—back-biting, detraction. Envy is a lurking serpent in the bosom of him who holds it; it pines for food; and evil speaking, detraction, is the nourishment by which it lives. Deprive it of this food, and it dies.

When therefore we see or hear persons speaking evil of others, and striving to injure them we know the lurking serpent is in their hearts; they are to be pitied more than the object of their detraction; because the serpent thus nourished will ultimately sting them to death; therefore put it away, and make no delay in doing so; and "as new-born babes"—or, as babes just born, "desire, earnestly desire, long for—the sincere"—pure unmixed, unadulterated—"milk of the word." This is the true nourishment of that spiritual nature, when it first develops itself; and without which it cannot live, much less can it grow. The pure, unadulterated word is that which God has appointed to nourish, strengthen and bring forward that new development in man. Let all understand this; and let these tender ones, who have just been brought to the commencement of this new life, desire—earnestly desire—this nourishment, that they may "grow"—flourish, prosper, enlarge—"thereby, if so be"—since—"ye have tasted that the Lord is gracious;" having begun in the spiritual life let us increase and strengthen it; and in order thereto, take that nourishment which is adapted to our state and condition; and especially beware of that food which nourishes the serpent—envy.

"To whom coming"—that is, spiritually, by this new nature as naturally drawn to Christ as the new-born babe turns to its mother for that nourishment which she alone can give. But the figure is now changed, and Christ the Lord is presented as "a living stone"—a stone in which there is life—a stone that enlivens, revives, reanimates, causes to live all that come to it and build upon it—"disallowed"—rejected, disapproved, thrown aside as worthless—"of men;" first of the Jews as a people; since that by all men who give themselves up to follow the leading of their animal nature; or who seek nothing more than mere intellectual enjoyments. These last professing themselves wise become fools, and prefer to drink water out of their own broken cisterns, to being dependent upon Christ for the water of life; or to keep to the figure in the text, they choose to build on the sand rather than to be dependent upon that stone, or rock, Christ Jesus. Though thus thrown aside as worthless by men, he is "chosen"—selected "of God."

Here, then, is the whole controversy now between God and men. God made choice of, approved and accepted His Son, Jesus Christ, to be the head of the spiritual creation, or foundation of all immortality, incorruptiblity, and endless life. With this choice God is well pleased; and in his sight this foundation stone is "precious"—honorable, highly esteemed, costly; but men are dissatisfied with it, and cast it aside as worthless: the wisdom of God has devised it; men account it folly: God's purpose is, that salvation, immortality, incorruptibility, endless life shall be attained in no other way; and all the efforts of men to arrive at these blessings by any other means are as fruitless as the attempt at Babylon to build a tower up to heaven; and the confusion of language at the time of that folly, was no greater than the vexations that men now inflict on themselves in endeavoring to "be as Gods;" or, to be immortal without Christ.

The purpose of God is unchangeable; eternal life is given to us in Christ, and no where else; so that he who continues to contest the case with God will as surely perish forever—utterly and totally perish, and "be as though he had not been"—as God is more mighty than man. On the other hand they, who submit to God's choice become "as lively stones."—stones having life, by their connection with the foundation, and "are built up a spiritual house"—dwelling, mansion, a house of God, temple, a temple of the Holy Spirit—"a holy priest-hood to offer up spiritual sacrifices" instead of those animal sacrifices offered under the law; and still offered in another form, by many under the gospel; who it is to be feared, being ignorant of the spiritual character of the offerings God requires, think to please him with an animal excitement, which they mistake for "spiritual sacrifices;" but the latter only are "acceptable"—grateful, pleasing—"to God, by"—through, on account of—"Jesus Christ."

INSPIRATION OF THE BIBLE.

Nothing is gained to the cause of truth by insisting that everything that is recorded in the Bible was given by direct inspiration from God. Such a pretention is one thing that has helped to make Infidels. By rejecting such a claim the Deists in the Hartford Convention of 1853 were defeated. We took the ground, in opposing them, substantially, presented by Bishop Watson in his "Apology for the Bible," in reply to Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason," published in 1799. Watson was Bishop of Landaff, and Professor of Divinity in Cambridge University, so that he ought to have known what the Christians of his day did or did not believe concerning the Bible. In reply to Paine's harsh strictures on the Book of Rruth, he observes:

"Pretty stuff, indeed," you exclaim, "to be called the Word of God!" It seems to me that you do not perfectly comprehend what is meant by the expression—the Word of God—or the divine authority of the Scriptures. I will explain it to you in the words of Dr. Law, late Bishop of Carlisle, and in those of St. Austin. My first quotation is from Bishop Law's Theory of Religion, a book not undeserving your notice:

"The true sense, then, of the divine authority of the books of the Old Testament, and which, perhaps, is enough to denominate them in general divinely inspired, seems to be this: that as in those times God has all along, besides the inspection or superintendency of his general providence, interfered upon particular occasions by giving express commissions to some persons (thence called prophets) to declare his will in various manners, and degrees of evidence, as best suited the occasion, time, and nature of the subject; and in all other cases left them wholly to themselves; in like manner, he has interposed his more immediate assistance, and notified it to them, (as they did to the world,) in the recording of these revelations; so far as that was necessary, amid the common, (but from hence termed sacred) history of those times, and mixed with various other occurrences, in which the historian's own natural qualifications were sufficient to enable him to relate things with all the accuracy they required."

The passage from St. Austin is this: "I am of opinion that those men to whom the Holy Ghost revealed what ought to be received as authoritative in religion, might write some things as men with historical diligence, and other things as prophets by divine inspiration, that the former may be attributed to themselves as contributing to the increase of knowledge, and the latter to God speaking by them things appertaining to the authority of religion."

Whether this opinion be right or wrong, I do not here inquire; it is the opinion of many learned men and good Christians; and if you will adopt it as your opinion, you will see cause, perhaps to become a Christian yourself; you will see cause to consider chronological, geographical, or geneological errors—apparent mistakes or real contradictions as to historical facts—needless repetitions and trifling interpolations—indeed you will see cause to consider all the principal objections of your book to be absolutely without foundation. Receive but the Bible as composed by upright and well informed, though in some respects, fallible men, (for I exclude all fallibility when they profess to deliver the word of God), and you must receive it as a book revealing to you, in many parts, the express will of God; and in other parts, relating to you the ordinary history of the times.

Give but the authors of the Bible that credit which you give to other historians; believe them to deliverthe word of God, when they tell you they do so; believe when they relate other things as of themselves, and not of the Lord, that they wrote to the best of their knowledge and capacity; and you will be in your belief something very different from a deist; you may not be allowed to aspire to the character of an orthodox believer, but you will not be an unbeliever in the divine authority of the Bible; though you should admit human mistakes and human opinions to exist in some parts of it. This I take to be the first step toward the removal of the doubts of many skeptical men; and when they are advanced thus far, the grace of God, assisting a teachable disposition, and a pious intention, may carry them on to perfection.

CATHOLOCISM: WHAT IS IT?

Let the following, which shows the "cloven foot," testify as to its true character. The Shepherd of the Valley, published under the eye and professing to speak with the approbation of the Catholic Bishop of St. Louis, a few years since gave vent to such sentiments as these:

"The Church, we admit, is of necessity intolerant; that is, she does every thing in her power to check, as effectually as circumstances will admit, the progress of crime and error. Her intolerance follows necessarily from her claim to infallibility; she alone has the right to be intolerant. Heresy she inserts in her catalogue of mortal sins; she endures it when and where she must; but she hates it, and directs all her energy to effect its destruction. If the Catholics ever gain, which they surely will do, though at a distant day, an immense numerical majority religious freedom in this country is at an end. So say our enemies. So we believe.

"We gain nothing by declaring so earnestly against the doctrine of civil punishment of spiritual crimes. Our enemies will not believe that we are better than our church, and—for her—her history is before them; they know what she sanctioned during the middle ages, what she did then, and does now where she can; they know, too, what they would do, were they in power; they judge us by themselves. They can reason besides, and when we say two and two, they will add, make four, whatever we can do to stop them. Heresy is a mortal sin, kills the soul, and sends the entire man, body and soul, to hell; it is, besides, a contagious disease, and affects the interests of unborn millions. Christian kings, believing this, will crush it in the shell. Christian States, knowing this, will drive it from their bodies when they can.

"We will say, however, that we are not in favor of roasting heretics, and that, if this sort of work is to be revived—though in our miserable times it is quite impossible, since men have no belief which they care to propagate, or for which they dare endure—if persecution is to be renewed, we would rather be its victims than its agents; but we are not, therefore, going to deny the facts of history, or to blame the Saints of God or the Pastors of the Church for what they have done and sanctioned. We say that the temporal punishment of heresy is a mere question of expediency; that Protestants do not persecute us here, simply because they have not the power; and that where we abstain from persecuting them, they are well aware that it is merely because we cannot do so, or think that, by doing so, we should injure the cause we wish to serve."

Such is the spirit of all sectarianism, wherever it is found. No worse in one class of men than in another; nor will it die till Christ the Restorer returns from heaven. But the foregoing language shows what we have often said, that Romanism seeks the civil power in this country, and means to hurl it against all religion but its own. Let us all beware of receiving the mark of this beast; for their fate is to "drink of the vials of God's wrath, poured out without mixture."

The following, communicated to the Times by "An English Clergyman," of recent date, shows the intolerance and bigotry of Popery where it possesses power. The writer says:

"I am an English clergyman. In traveling in the North of Spain a few weeks since, I proposed to pass a Sunday in a town where I ascertained that many English families resided, principally connected with the railway now in progress. On making inquiry, I found that during two years, in which many of them had resided there, they had only on two occasions received a visit from an English clergyman, and had not once had an opportunity of receiving the Holy Sacrament. An English gentleman, much interested in the welfare of his countrymen, gladly offered me the use of a room in his own house, and gave information by private notes sent to the different English families. On Sunday morning a very respectable and attentive congregation of thirty or forty persons was assembled, and about fifteen received at Sacrament. But it appears that so simple and unostentatious a religious act is not to be permitted in Spain. Two days afterwards the Alcalde of the town sent an official communication, of which a translation is subjoined, to the master of the house in which the service was held:

"Inasmuch as it has come to my knowledge, that, on Sunday, there was held in your house a meeting, at which were practised religious ceremonies belonging to the Protestant mode of worship which you profess, conducted by a minister of that sect; and, insomuch as in this nation there are not tolerated nor permitted ceremonies of any religion than that of the Catholic Apostolic Roman Church, I address myself to you, Sir, in order that, as a master of your house, you may avoid the repetition of acts, which, besides being opposed to our religious faith, have, by the publicity and impudence with which they have been done, attracted the attentian of this neighborhood. It being well understood that if the warning which you hereby receive is not sufficient to prohibit such acts either in your house or in the house of any other British subject, I shall have recourse to the means which are in my power to repress such a scandalous abuse, and to punish whatever leads to such a culpable result."

MORE FABLES.

"The Creator has given us these bodies to be our habitation—a dwelling adapted to our highest comfort and welfare. Our individual identity does not consist in the body. The body is not the man. The man is really an invisible being; and his body is the house in which he lives. The eye is no part of man; it is only the window of the house through which he looks out upon the world. The ear is no part of man; it is only the earthly medium through which sound is conveyed to the dweller within. When the house decays he will live elsewhere. It is now a habitation fitted up by the Creator, of which he should be a faithful steward and tenant, till called hence to give an account. But if he wantonly destroy that dwelling, suddenly or gradually, by setting it on fire, to enjoy the splendor of the flames, or the grandeur of the lighted clouds of smoke, or by gradually digging away the foundation on which the vital structure is based, he stands charged with the crime of suicide before heaven, and must answer to it in the day of judgment."

Br. Storrs—The foregoing is extracted from a physiological work containing much useful information, and compiled with more than ordinary ability. I was strnck with the inconsistency and falsity of this position, and exclaimed in the language of holy writ—"Great men are not always wise." How strange, surpassingly strange, that such a dogma is so universally believed, even by those of superior talent and learning; and who, upon other points, are capable of sound reasoniug and discernment! Alas! "That old serpent" has wound his coils around the human mind, and fastened them so strongly, that it seems almost impossible they should ever be unloosed. The main point of his deception is to lead men to believe that they are something more than what they really are—and thus cause them to be "lifted up with pride," and fall into the same "condemnation," into which he has fallen. Herein lay the force of the temptation in Eden. "Ye are something more than human beings," said this great deceiver; "even immortal—and when ye have tasted the forbidden fruit your eyes will be opened to discern your exalted state—ah ye shall be as gods—or the Elohim—angels." Such was his assertion; and though nearly six thousand years have elapsed, he is still in the same subtle way proclaiming it, and constantly gaining victims to the deception.

There is one point in the extract to which I wished particularly to draw attention. It is this—That if man destroys in any way the dwelling or habitation wherein the part constituting his identity lives, he stands charged with the crime of suicide before heaven, and must accordingly give account. Now let us see if this is logical. What is the crime of suicide? It is self-murder, or the act of destroying one's self. But the author has stated in so many words, that "The body is not the man," but that "the man is an invisible being within." Then, of course, the body is not himself, and if he merely destroys the habitation containing himself, how can it be suicide? That invisible part, constituting the man, according to the same philosophy, cannot be destroyed. It is immortal—imperishable. I unhesitatingly affirm then—that in accordance with this mode of reasoning, No man can kill himself: that the crime of suicide never has been, and never can be committed—and therefore should be blotted out of the catalogue.

Now I leave it to the intelligent mind to say whether this is not the more logical deduction from such premises. Surely, all will assent to it. But reason, common sense, and the Bible have all given way before this false philosophy; and yet the great mass see not its absurdity.

Strange, indeed, that the Bible makes the mere dwelling of man of so much importance, and regards so little the "invisible man" himself! Even the gospel hope is based wholly upon the resurrection of this "habitation"! The apostles devoted their entire energies to the preaching of "Jesus and the resurrection of the dead." Yes, he desired to have his "habitation" quickened by the Spirit of God, and live eternally. Why, O why beloved apostle, didst thou not say something about the invisible man? Why so anxious about the mere covering, if the real man were to live, at all events? Would not that individual be counted a fool, who, possessing a gem of invaluable treasure, should lavish all his praise and delight upon the mere box containing it? Away with such utter perversion of just reasoning, sound philosophy, and the word of God, as that we have been considering. Truth is ever in harmony with the dictates of Reason; and God the mighty author of Truth, hath never enjoined upon our faith gross absurdities! No, never.

This is indeed a great subject, and much more might be said even upon this feature of it. The Lord be praised that truth is finding its way into some minds, and making progress. May these few hints aid in a measure the blessed cause. J.

Synopsis of News.

A little more than two months ago, Jefferson Davis, as the acknowledged head of the now exploded "Confederacy," was supported by three considerable armies—Genls. Lee's and Johnson's East, and Smith's West of the Mississippi. In this short space of time, the whole concern has crumbled to pieces. The several armies have one after another surrendered; and numerous bands of guerillas, which infested the South, have either followed the example of the larger organizations, or disbanded and returned quietly to their homes.

All armed opposition to the Government being put down, on Friday last the President issued his proclamation announcing that the blockade of Galveston and all the ports of Texas—those of all the other States having been previously opened—would be raised on the first of July. So that on that day foreign commerce will again be free to every port of the United States.

The would-be President is now an inhabitant of Fortress Monroe, and is so closely guarded that not a single person has seen him, excepting the guards and Gen. Miles, since his confinement. Not a word is allowed to be said to him, and he no doubt has ample time to reflect upon his past career of wickedness. His diet, until lately, has been the same as that of the rest of the captured traitors—Government rations....Alex'r H. Stephens, late Vice-President of the bogus Confederacy, is still confined in Fort Warren, Boston harbor, and his name is on the list of those who have applied to the President for pardon....John Mitchell, editor of one of the Richmond journals during the last four years, immediately upon the downfall of the rebellion, was invited to take charge of the editorial department of the Daily News of this city, which invitation he accepted, but has since been arrested and incarcerated in the same fort with Davis.

The trial of the conspirators, at Washington, is drawing to a close....Since the change of military commanders at Richmond, the condition of the Freedmen in that vicinity is said to be receiving more attention than before. Further South the Freedmen are reported to be in a more prosperous condition; and Mr. J. E. Bryant, General Superintendent of the Freedmen of South Carolina and Georgia, has issued a circular that gives the planters to understand that the blacks are free in fact as well as in name, and that they have one watching their interests who has the power and disposition to protect them in their just rights. He has fixed the wages of the Freedmen as follows: For male and female hands $6, $7 per month; half hands $3 00, $3 50; house servants $5, $10 per month, according to their classification.

"A collision took place on Thursday on the Ohio and Mississippi Railroad, near Loogootee, Ind., between a freight train and a train conveying soldiers. The engineers and firemen of both trains were killed. The two conductors undertook to repair damages by engaging in a dispute as to which was to blame. While they were engaged in this occupation, another freight train came along and ran into the train of soldiers, killing fifteen men and wounding one hundred and fifty, many fatally. The soldiers were homeward-bound men of Illinois and Missouri regiments.

Some mitigating circumstances might be found, though we doubt it, to excuse the first collission, but we do not consider it within the compass of human possibility to make the second less than a crime. The conductor, who neglected to send back a flag-man and to take other obvious precautions to prevent action while he bandied words with his neighbor, was guilty of murder, and should be held responsible for that crime." INWARD PEACE.—Many say they have no peace nor rest, but so many crosses and trials, afflictions and sorrows, that they know not how they shall get through them. Now he who in truth will perceive and take note, perceiveth clearly, that true peace and rest lie not in outward things; for if it were so, the evil spirit also would have peace when things go according to his will, which is nowise the case.

Therefore we must consider and see what is that peace which Christ left to his disciples when he said: "My peace I leave with you, my peace I give unto you."

Christ meant that inward peace which can break through all assaults and crosses of oppression, suffering, misery, humiliation, and what more there may be of the like, so that a man may be joyful and patient therein; and what was bitter to him before shall become sweet, and his heart shall remain unmoved under all changes, at all times.—Theologia Germanica

The Herald of Life.

NEW YORK, JUNE 28, 1865.

NO IMMORTALITY NOR FUTURE LIFE, EXCEPT IN JESUS CHRIST ALONE, AND BY A RESURRECTION AT THE LAST DAY IF DEAD, OR A CHANGE IF ALIVE.

PHOTOGRAPHS.—For the gratification of some of our subscribers, who have urged us to send them our Photograph, we have submitted to a "sitting," and can now furnish them, if desired, with "VIGNETTES." They have cost us twenty-five cents each, and the postage would be three cents more, if sent by mail. We do not solicit any orders for them, as it is of no advantage to us except the satisfaction of obliging our friends.

Patience and Charity.

If we believed to constitute a man a real Christian, he must be perfect in knowledge and judgment, we should never hope to find a Christian on earth, till the next age shall come. If men are sincerely inquiring after truth, and using the best light they have, and do fall into some error, they are no more blame-worthy than they would be for having a fever, or breaking their bones, or being destitute of daily food. We might just as well fall into a passion with our fellow-men suffering with hunger, being sick, or breaking their bones, as to get out of humor with them for their errors in doctrine, if they manifest the spirit of Christ in their lives, and are using their best endeavors to inform themselves as to what is truth. To be sick, or to be in error, are both misfortunes, and both cause loss and pain to a greater or less extent. The subject of these calamities is to be pitied not abused. We would think him a tiger that would fall upon a man with a broken bone and abuse him. Surely error is worse to the individual than broken bones; and we all have more or less; let us never forget that.

Some people are always chafing because everybody does not, see, feel, and talk like themselves. They give themselves and others very much uneasiness and disquietude. Let us faithfully present our views of truth, and rest quietly in the Lord, who will see to results. We should study to know the truth and cheerfully communicate it to our fellow-men; but it is all useless to worry and chafe because others do not receive it, or even if they oppose it. Let us remember the Lord ruleth over all. The following story may be read often with profit by all such as fear the world will fall if their plans and ideas are not received and carried out:

"When Bulstrode Whitelocke was embarking as Cromwell's envoy to Sweden, in 1653, he was much disturbed in mind as he rested in Harwich on the preceding night, which was very stormy, while he reflected on the distracted state of the nation. It happened that a confidential servant slept in an adjacent bed, who, finding that his master could not sleep, at length said, 'Pray, Sir, will you give me leave to ask you a question?' 'Certainly.' 'Pray, Sir, don't you think that God governed the world very well before you came into it?' 'Undoubtedly.' 'And pray, Sir, don't you think he will govern it quite as well when you are gone out of it?' 'Certainly.' 'Then, Sir, pray excuse me, but don't you think you may trust him to govern it quite as well as long as you live?' To this question Whitelocke had nothing to reply; but turning himself about, soon fell asleep till he was summoned to embark."

A Challenge.

"To GEO. STORRS.—I call upon you to prove that either Jesus or his Apostles ever attempted to disprove the doctrine of the immortality of the soul as held by the Jews in their day. I deny that either Jesus or his Apostles predicated the possession of eternal life upon a resurrection from the dead to take place at the appearing of the Lord."

Our Lord, Mark x. 30, in answering Peter's question as to what he and his fellow disciples might expect, having left all to follow him, assured them they should "receive a hundred fold now in this present time:...... and in the world to come eternal life." This promise presented eternal life as something not to be given in actual possession "in this present time," but to be given "in the world to come;" and in John vi. 40, our Lord says—"This is the will of him that sent me, that every one which seeth the Son and believeth on him, may have everlasting life: and I will raise him up at the last day."

Thus we have, in these two testimonies of our Lord, the facts clearly stated that eternal life belongs to "the world to come," and in order to that inheritance, the promise is given of a resurrection at the last day. That this resurrection is "to take place at the appearing of the Lord" we prove from 1 Thess. iv. 13—17, where the apostle states that the dead are "asleep," and that God will as surely bring them up from the dead as he brought Christ up; and then states definitely when this shall be—"For the Lord himself"—not the Lord in the Spirit—but "the Lord himself shall descend from Heaven, with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God: and the dead in Christ shall rise first: then we which are alive and remain [not having fallen asleep prior to that time] shall be caught up together with them [viz., the raised ones] in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air: and so shall we ever be with the Lord."

Let us now combine these three testimonies—First—The promise of "life eternal in the world to come." Second—Those who are to inherit that life, our Lord says, "I will raise up at the last day." Third—Paul says: This resurrection shall take place when "the Lord himself shall descend from heaven."

To this we may add Paul's exhortation to Timothy, 1 Tim. vi. 12—16, "Fight the good fight of faith, lay hold on eternal life;....I give thee charge in the sight of God....that thou keep this commandment....until the appearing of our Lord Jesus Christ; which in his times he shall show the blessed and only Potentate, the King of kings and Lord of lords; who only hath immortality," &c.

Here we see that eternal life and immortality is something the christian is called to "lay hold" of; and that to secure it he is to labor "till the appearing of Jesus Christ;" thus showing that the "possession of eternal life" is "predicted upon a resurrection, to take place at the appearing of our Lord;" or, a change at that time equivalent to a resurrection. But if any doubt remained on the mind it is removed by the apostle in 2 Tim. iv. 1–8. He says to Timothy, "I charge thee before God, and the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall judge the quick and the dead at his appearing and kingdom," &c.; and he adds, "I am now ready to be offered, [or, I am about to be poured out as a libation] and the time of my departure [or dissolution] is at hand;.... henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, [who is to "judge the quick and dead at his appearing and kingdom,"] shall give me in that day; and not to me only, but unto all them also that love his appearing."

This testimony is of itself, we humbly conceive, sufficient to establish the point denied in the challenge, and especially when taken in connection with what we have previously adduced from our Lord and Paul.

If the Jews did hold the doctrine of the immortality of the soul in our Lord's day, they held equally the transmigration of souls—or the passing of souls from one body to another among men—and let our challenger show when and where "Jesus or his apostles ever attempted to disprove the doctrine of" such transmigration. The fact is, the doctrine of the Sadduces and Pharisees both were a poisonous "leaven," of which our Lord warned his followers to "beware." We, however, maintain that our Lord and his apostles did teach clearly, plainly and constantly, that a future life depended upon a resurrection of the dead, and that death is the doom and end of the wicked.

What is the Christian's Hope?

It is usual first to state the negative and then the affirmative. We shall, however, take the opposite course, and first show what the hope is.

Let us look at 1 Pet. i. 3 to 5, 13—"Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, which according to his abundant mercy hath begotten us again unto a lively hope by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, to an inheritance incorruptible and undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven for you, who are kept up by the power of God through faith unto salvation, ready to be revealed in the last time....Wherefore gird up the loins of your mind, be sober, and hope to the end for the grace that is to be brought unto you at the revelation of Jesus Christ."

Here Peter states that by the resurrection of our Lord from the dead we have a lively hope to an inheritance reserved, and to be revealed in the last time; or at the revelation of Jesus Christ. This hope, then, is not of going to heaven at death, but of a resurrection from the dead into the incorruptible inheritance. Compare this with 1 Corth. xv. 17–19—"For if the dead rise not, then is not Christ raised: And if Christ be not raised, your faith is vain: ye are yet in your sins. Then they also which have fallen asleep in Christ are perished. If in this life only we have hope in Christ, we are of all men most miserable."

Here again the Christian's hope is in the resurrection from the dead. The same thing is expressed Rom. viii. 22–25—"For we know that the whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain together until now. And not only they, but ourselves also, which have the first-fruits of the Spirit, even we ourselves, groan within ourselves, waiting for the adoption, to wit, the redemption of our body. For we are saved by hope: but hope that is seen, is not hope: for what a man seeth, why doth he yet hope for? But if we hope for that we see not, then do we with patience wait for it." The resurrection is here looked to as the consummation of the hope of the lover of Christ.

When is this to be realized? See Phil. iii. 20, 21—"For our conversation is in heaven; from whence also we look for the Saviour the Lord Jesus Christ....Who shall change our vile body, that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body, according to the working whereby he is able even to subdue all things unto himself." At the revelation of our Lord Jesus Christ, then, the hope is to be consummated, and these vile bodies are to undergo that change which will prepare us for the incorruptible inheritance.

Again, 1 John iii. 2, 3—"Beloved, now are we the sons of God, and it doth not yet appear what we shall be: but we know that, when he shall appear, we shall be like him; for we shall see him as he is. And every man that hath this hope in him, purifieth himself, even as he is pure." Here the period when the christian's hope is to be realized is clearly stated to be at the appearing of Christ, when we shall be made like him: and the effect of this hope upon us, in the present time, is fully brought to view, viz.: purity, "as he is pure."

See also, Col. iii. 4—"When Christ, who is our life, shall appear, then shall ye also appear with him in glory." Here we see the Christian's hope is to be realized at the appearing of him who is our life: then, and not till then, will the saints appear with Christ in glory.

Let us now examine 1 Thess. iv. 13–17—"But I would not have you to be ignorant, brethren, concerning them which are asleep, that ye sorrow not, even as others which have no hope. For if we believe that Jesus died and rose again, even so them also which sleep in Jesus will God bring with him." "Bring with him," from where? Not from heaven as some suppose; but, from the dead. Paul says, Heb. xiii. 20—"The God of peace who brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus." In the text under consideration he comforts Christians with the assurance that as certain as God brought Jesus from the dead, so all that sleep in Jesus will he bring with him. It is the certainty of their resurrection that the apostle is teaching; and he goes on to tell when that event will take place. "For this we say unto you by the word of the Lord, that we which are alive, and remain unto the coming of the Lord, shall not prevent them which are asleep. For the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God: and the dead in Christ shall rise first. Then we which are alive and remain, shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air; and so shall we ever be with the Lord."

Here then the Christian's hope is fully stated. It is clearly not a hope that those who have died have gone to heaven, but a hope in the coming of the Lord to raise the dead and change the living saints. We wish to make this point distinct before the mind, in order that we may see and feel the importance of the advent of Christ and the resurrection of the dead.

If the doctrine, that when a man dies he enters at once into a state of conscious blessedness is true, we should have a right to expect that it would be explicitly revealed—the same as the being and attributes of God—the work of creation—the fall of man—his recovery by a promised Messiah—man's subjection to death—his resurrection—the new heavens and new earth, &c. But, is the doctrine of going to heaven at death, or consciousness after death, before the resurrection, as clearly revealed as either of the aforesaid doctrines? We think not. Let us examine, at present, the Old Testament. We take the position, then, that there is not a single text in the Old Testament that clearly teaches any such doctrine; and, but three or four that can be even tortured to sustain such a theory by implication; while several positively declare the opposite doctrine.

The text Eccl. xii. 7, has often been quoted in proof that there is in man a spirit that remains conscious when he is dead,—"Then shall the dust return to the earth as it was; and the spirit shall return to God who gave it." Now, this is as true of the wicked man as of the good; and it just as truly proves universal salvation as it proves that a man is alive when he is dead. But we repeat, what we have often said, until it can be proved that this spirit, whatever it is, had consciousness before God gave it to man, it never can be proved, from this text, that it has consciouscess after it returns whence it came. The natural inference is, that the spirit returns to the same state it was in before man had consciousness. Every man knows he had no consciousness prior to his present organization; yet his spirit—life, breath—came from God and returns to God, as his body came from the ground and returns to the earth: and there is nothing in this text which can prove that that which returns to God has consciousness any more than the body has life and feeling when it returns to the earth. But to settle that point, the same writer, in chap. ix. 5, positively declares, "the dead know not anything; and a mere inference drawn from the language of a writer, must fall before a positive declaration of the same writer that the inference is false. Such is the case under consideration.

Another view, however, of Eccl. xii. 7, may be taken, which is this. "The spirit," which "returns to God who gave it," is God's spirit, and not man's. By turning to the discourse of Elihu, Job xxxiii. 4, we find the following sentiment:—"The Spirit of God hath made me, and the breath of the Almighty hath given me life." He afterwards says, chap. xxxiv. 14, 15, "If he (God) set his heart upon man, if he (God) gather unto himself his spirit and his breath; all flesh shall perish together, and man shall turn unto dust."

Here, certainly, the language warrants us in concluding that it is God's Spirit that he gathers unto himself; the doing of which causes "man to turn again unto dust." By that Spirit men are "made" and sustained in life; when God withdraws it, or it "returns unto God who gave it," man sinks back into dust from whence he came, and "in that very day his thoughts perish:" Psa. cxlvi. 4. There is good reason, therefore, for thinking that "the spirit," Eccl. xiii. 7, is the Spirit of God and not of man. But if it is man's, we have shown there is proof positive, out of the same writer's testimony, that it knows "not anything," and that "there is no knowledge in the grave"—in sheol—in the state of the dead; for that is the sense of the term sheol, in Eccl. ix 10 tran slated grave. It is the state of the dead that Solomon affirms is one where "there is no knowledge." Without a resurrection then, there is no hope of a future life. The hope of a resurrection was the hope of all the saints of the Bible, and not a hope of going to heaven at death, for which there is not a single testimony in the Scriptures.

He that is not open to conviction is not qualified for discussion.—Bishop Whately.

The Wendell and Grant Discussion.

"It was claimed again that the judgment was only for the righteous. But we found the Scriptures affirming that 'whoremongers ane adulterers God will judge.' Heb. xiii. 4. As these classes could not be considered as belonging to the righteous, it was afterward admitted that Matt. xii. 36, applies to the wicked: 'But I say unto you, that every idle word that men shall speak, they shall give account thereof in the day of judgment.' We then called attention to the fact that the Greek word, rendered account, in Matt. xii. 36, was logos; which is defined as follows:—'A saying, speaking, that which is said or spoken, a statement, an oracular response, report, authentic narrative, history, account, dialogue, conversation, discussion, a discourse about one.'—Liddell and Scott. This scripture teaches most plainly that all must be present 'in the day of judgment, and give account,' each one for himself. This was not met, only with a passing remark, that it probably related to the first advent of our Saviour, which we thought could not be, because Jesus said, when speaking of his first advent, 'If any man hear my words, and believe not, I judge him not; for I come not to judge the world. ....The word that I have spoken, the same shall judge him in the last day.' John xii. 47, 48. Paul says: 'Therefore judge nothing before the time, until the Lord come.' 1 Cor. iv. 5. This passage could not have reference to the first advent; for the Saviour had completed that, and been gone to heaven some twenty-nine years, when Paul wrote his first letter to the Corinthians. Hence, if 'every idle word that men' have spoken was brought to judgment at the first advent, it was 'before the time' appointed, and was not done in harmony with the express declarations of the Bible.

Luke xiii. 26, 27, was presented as proof that the wicked dead dead must rise in order to fulfil the Scripture:—'Then shall ye begin to say, We have eaten and drunk in thy presence, and thou hast taught in our streets. But he shall say, I tell you I know not whence ye are; depart from me, all ye workers of iniquity.' The people of Boston could not say that Christ had taught in their streets; yet it was claimed by the affirmative that this passage might be fulfilled by any of Christ's ministers."

COMMENTS ON THE ABOVE.

The first sentence in the foregoing extract is utterly without foundation, and I call upon Br. Grant to correct it in his columns without further delay. It is almost two months since he was notified that the statement was entirely inaccurate, but still he makes no retraction. Not one word did the affirmative utter, in any of his twenty-five speeches, that could, even by remotest implication, justify the assertion of the Crisis, that "It was claimed again that the judgment was only for the righteous." Had my brother imputed to me the proposition that none but thieves will inherit eternal life, the injustice of the remark, though more flagrant, would not have been more real; and for the truth of this averment I can with confidence appeal to every intelligent person who attended our debate. The already-published speech in support of my second Proposition, shows how unlikely it is, that I could have "claimed" that the wicked would escape "judgment." I did nothing of the kind. And yet I bring against my brother no charge of intentional misrepresentation. The fact is, that, from the commencement to the close of the discussion, Br. G. waded in a sea of polemic troubles, and it is not to be wondered at, that the notes he made of his opponents arguments should, in some instances, reflect the confusion that existed in his own mind. If I can persuade him to debate the Non-resurrection question with me once more,—say in New York City, the coming autumn,—I will suggest a way by which he can easily prevent misreporting me afterwards; but as to the troubles above alluded to, instead of his being able to avoid them, he will find them growing worse and worse. This remark is not made at random, nor is it likely to be received with incredulity by many of those who witnessed his achievements in the eight evenings of March last. But I remember the proverb, "A burnt child dreads the fire," and so would not too readily flatter myself that my brother can ever again be drawn into a controversy on the question of Life only in Christ. But "we shall see what we shall see."

"As these classes ['whoremongers and adulterers'] could not be considered as belonging to the righteous, it was afterward admitted that Matt. xii. 36, applies to the wicked." Indeed! "It was afterward admitted"! Just as if the negative had to cite "Heb. xiii. 4" to convince the affiramative that "Matt. xii. 36" did not apply to the righteous. Moonshine! The affirmative was never in doubt, and never expressed a misgiving, on that point, and he readily acquits Br. G. of ever giving him a single new idea in regard to it.

The passage in Matthew, Br. G. says, "teaches most plainly that all must be present," etc. How is this? I presume that in his "all" my brother includes the righteous. But, in his debate with Br. Curry (see Disc., p. 41), he avers—and says he "finds it so in the Scriptures"—that "the righteous will not go into judgment"! And elsewhere (p. 28) he had said—"if there is no resurrection of the wicked, we see no need of a judgment-day." In the light of these unretracted declarations, will Br. G. tell his readers, and thus afford us the privilege of telling ours, what he means by saying, that "all must be present 'in the day of judgment,' and 'give account,' each one for himself"? Should he reply, that he means, in his report, "all" the wicked, and that this limitation of the term is demanded by the connection in which it stands, I have then only to say, that he does homage to a principle of interpretation the force of which the affirmative vainly sought to make him admit in the debate. What is herehinted at, will be fully explained when our report reaches that grand utterance of the Apostle—"In Christ shall all be made alive." O, Br. G.! don't you wish that the affirmative would so thoroughly forget that part of the debate, as to be unable to give any account of it? What will the readers of the HERALD OF LIFE think of your logical abilities, when they are told of your floundering on that passage and its context? Your omission to bring it into your own sketches of the debate, I impute not to forgetfulness, but to a fearfully vivid recollection. But I must not anticipate.

My brother is a little unfortunate in his reference to John xii. 48. His theory of the time of the judgment of the wicked dead, is demolished by that passage. And the whole work is done by a little preposition! "In the last day," says the Saviour. Is Br. G. correct in explaining this to mean a thousand years after the Lord comes? One single fact settles it that he is not. "And this is the Father's will which hath sent me, that of all which he hath given me I should lose nothing, but should raise it up again at the last day." John vi. 39. This text tells us when the saints will be raised, and it does so by employing the expression "at the last day." The same phrase occurs in John xi. 24—"I know that he shall rise again in the resurrection at the last day." Now, in both of these passages the Greek preposition for "at" is EN, and in John xii. 48 the same preposition is rendered "in"—"the same shall judge him in the last day." The logic, therefore, that would defer the judgment of the wicked to the point where Br. G.'s thousand-year theory locates it, could with equal facility postpone the resurrection of the righteous a whole millenary beyond the point of time assigned for it by the Holy Scriptures. It seems to me, that no careful student of the Bible should be easily persuaded that our Lord used the phrase "at the last day," or "in the last day," with the latitude of import required for it by our brethren whose theory punishes the wicked dead with exclusion from the glories of God's kingdom a thousand years before it has them judged.

Br. Grant alludes to "1 Cor. iv. 5," but only to show that he does not understand it. By arguing that it "could not have reference to the first advent," he would show cause why "Matt. xii. 36" must have its accomplishment a thousand years beyond the second advent! In point of time, he applies the two texts a thousand years apart—unless he is prepared to exclude the righteous entirely from the passage in 1 Cor. But, should he do this, he is at once stranded upon an assumption manifestly opposed to the truth. For it is very clear, that 1 Cor. iv. 5 refers to the righteous alone. The passage reads thus: "Therefore judge nothing before the time, until the Lord come, who both will bring to light the hidden things of darkness, and will make manifest the counsels of the hearts: and then shall every man have praise of God." If "every man" here does not include the wicked, the text sheds no light whatever upon Br. G.'s proof-passage in Matthew; and that the wicked are not included in it, is evident from what is said of "PRAISE." The Greek word is EPAINOS, and is defined by Robinson's Lex. to mean "much praise, applause, commendation." Dr. Hodge explains it as importing in our passage "much praise, applause, a loud and clear acclaim of commendation; Well done, thou good and faithful servant!" As the author of the work "Retribution" treats the passage as if the word rendered "praise" in it might convey the notion of "punishment" as well as of "reward" (citing a note from Bloomfield on the text), it may be useful to state that EPAINOS occurs eleven times in the New Test., and is always translated "praise." (See Rom. ii. 29; xiii. 3; 1 Cor. iv. 5; 2 Cor. viii. 18; Eph. 1. 6, 12, 14; Phil. i. 11; iv. 8; 1 Pet. i. 7; ii. 14.) The "hidden things of darkness" referred to in 1 Cor. iv. 5 have no necessary connection with acts or thoughts of wickedness; Dr. Hodge explains the phrase—"things which are now hidden in darkness. This," he adds, "includes acts which are now unknown, and those principles of action which lie concealed in the recesses of the heart, where no human eye can reach them. This is all the context requires."

As to Matt. xii. 36, I did not say in the debate that it related to "the first advent of our Saviour," but Br. G.'s statement is not materially at fault, for I did claim that the passage probably related to the generation addressed in the chapter by our Lord. This I yet believe; and I think a careful study of the chapter should convince any one, that "the day of judgment" of verse 36 has undoubted reference to the "judgment" brought to view in verses 41 and 42. On these latter passages, I have heretofore written something in reply to the Crisis; but it is my purpose at a future time to take up the subject more fully in an article for these columns. I have collected some concessions on the passages, from eminent expositors, that I think will be read with interest. Before dismissing Matt. xii. 36 forthe present, I wish to request the inquiring reader to ponder, in connection, the two statements of the Saviour—"O generation of vipers, how can ye, being evil, SPEAK good things?" (verse 34), and "by thy WORDS thou shalt be condemned" (verse 37).

In relation to "Luke xiii. 26, 27," it is my conviction that its context disproves Br. G.'s interpretation. Verse 25 says, "When once the master of the house is risen up, and hath shut to the door," etc. These words, as I understand them, carry us down to the closing scenes of this age, and there is hence no need of applying the "ye" of the passage to resurrected sinners, nor any propriety in doing so. Br. G.'s understanding of the passage gives it a narrower application than that of his affirmative brother, for he (G.) makes the "ye" refer to those only who actually ate and drank in the Saviour's presence, and heard him teach in their streets. My brother's objection, that "The people of Boston could not say that Christ had taught in their streets," is sufficiently answered by the Redeemer's own explanation of such declarations as the following: "I was an hungered, and YE gave ME no meat: I was thirsty, and YE gave ME no drink: I was a stranger, and YE took ME not in: naked, and YE clothed ME not: sick, and in prison, and YE visited ME not." Matt. xxv. 42, 43. This language, I doubt [not], Br. Grant believes applicable to some "people of Boston." If he does so believe, and will explain how the inhabitants of that city, ever neglected to feed the Saviour when hungry, and to visit Him while imprisoned, he will have found out how "Luke xiii. 26, 27" can be true without invalidating the doctrine of the non-resurrection of the wicked dead. True and faithful was the declaration of YAHVEH through Daniel the prophet concerning the last days. "Many shall run to and fro, and knowledge shall be increased." The prediction is verified in every department of human thought, but especially in that of religion. Never were there such wonderful facilities for investigation and research, and never were there so many earnest and diligent explorers, in this "fruitful field." Solomon's words are literally fulfilled before our eyes—"Of the making of many books there is no end." It tasks one to keep account of the various works that pour in like a flood from all quarters, especially from Germany—that land of intellectual giants. The proverbial industry of the old Rabbins of the Masoretic celebrity is more than paralleled by the modern Germans. And scores of learned Anglo-Saxons stand ready to reproduce in English much that is of permanent value, besides a great deal that is not. But we must take the chaff with the wheat.

Next to the book-makers, we are indebted to book-preservers. Poor students have cause to thank God for Libraries, especially if conducted on the liberal plan of steadily adding new books. The Library referred to in our heading, although an infant as yet, bids fair to become worthy of its comprehensive name. "The General Theological Library," is pledged by its noble Constitution "to benefit all religious denomination, and to promote the interests of religion and the increase and diffusion of theological learning" by collecting "all works pertaining to theology and religious knowledge of any kind," and by having "a Reading-room, in which the religious newspapers, journals, reviews, pamphlets, &c., of all denominations shall be received." There is to be "nothing sectarian in its character, principles, or operations."

In the last Annual report (April, 1865) the stock is stated thus: Bound volumes 4,100; pamphlets 3,600; unbound newspapers 8,300. The reading-room regularly receives "nine quarterly reviews, two bi-monthlies, twenty-three monthlies, thirty-three weeklies;" nearly all "given to the Institution by their several proprietors."

Every large city in the country should follow the bright example of Boston, and thus benfit all classes of religious thinkers. We shall watch, as we have done, the progress of this excellent enterprise. We are sure that it will have the Divine approbation, and it should receive the support and patronage of the friends of truth in every Christian sect. Life-shares, fifty dollars each, "except when sold directly to a minister of the gospel, of whatever denomination, to whom the price shall be thirty dollars, and may be paid in four semi-annual instalments from the date of subscription." Annual subscribers pay "at the rate of five dollars a year, or three dollars for six months." Books may be taken from the Library, two volumes at a time. We hope our friends in Boston and vicinity will do themselves the honor of visiting this Institution, 41 Tremont St., Boston. J. T. C.

Western Mission.

We had a private note from Br. W. S. Campbell last week, in which he informed us that by various delays on the road and failures to make connections he did no arrive in Fulton Co., Ill., till Monday the 19th inst, which was after the first Grove-meeting had closed. We regret this misfortune; but he says, the Brethren did not complain, as they, fortunately, had help, and had a good meeting. This week we have received the following communication from him:

OTTO, Fulton Co., Ill., June 21, 1865.

BR. STORRS:—I have already informed you, by a private note, of my arrival on this missionary ground, where I was appointed to labor, by the friends in New York and others in the East, for a few weeks.

To dwell upon the incidents of the journey from New York to this field, now that its fatigues and toils, its harrassing disappointments and delays, with its anxieties, deprivations, apprehensions, and guessing how to reach this beautiful part of the country, for want of a little more definite information as to the mode of passing from the larger places, would not promise, perhaps, much profit or interest, now that the brethren are waiting to obtain reports of the labor itself. Letters to Br. Lewis being delayed, he replied, but too late for me to obtain his answers, giving full directions. If I had only received his reply it would have given me victory over delays, unpleasant and apprehensive speculation, as to time and localities, some extra expense, and, probably, a very miserable state of health for a few days.

But as I found there was nothing gained by worriment, so there will be nothing now secured by complaint. And as there seems to have been no special drawback upon the enterprise by the failure to get here just as soon as was expected (since there was providentially help at the first meeting), so there is no use, in particular, in reflecting that improvements might have been made and better success have been secured by a change of programme.

I will therefore leave any points that I may wish to touch—in the hurried scenes of travel which so rapidly succeeded each other that another came rushing upon the conception before a first could be realized—to some future time, merely remarking that I left New York on Wednesday June 14. Well, when I arrived at Havanna, Ill., (which is a "right smart" place on the east bank of the Illinois river, fifty or sixty miles south of Peoria, but looks to a New England man like an unfinished village,) where I thought the worst of my difficulties would ensue, (for I looked over upon the wide bottom-land, with the burning noonday sun pouring its terrible heat upon the road, to the bluff and ridge where lived Charles Brown, in Fulton Co.) I truly waited for directions. I did not move twenty feet from the cars, however, before I inquired; and the first man knew the people over there, and he went with me to see Br. Bunnell, who was in that town at the moment; and the next moment the "Old one-armed Preacher" turned up, who was waiting for me; for he had an impression that I should come on that day, and had come down from Otto to meet me. We had had a brief acquaintance several years ago. Now it was really refreshing to meet him—a travel worn pilgrim that I was—and a true yoke fellow that he is.

We soon found ourselves pleasantly situated at Br. Brown's, and at the place of meeting. I find that there is a call for labor in this county, for several weeks. The meeting at Summum, four miles from Otto, will begin on Friday the 23d. We trust the Lord will be with us in power, and cause the word to become effectual in the hearts of the people, who we expect will come freely to listen. The meeting at Charles Brown's last week, was one of interest. There is a disposition to hear upon the important theme of Life only in Christ. There will be plenty of labor in Fulton County, where a "heap of people" have heard of the truth which constitutes the burden of our mission. Many have already listened to it, and "devout men and women," not a few, have believed.

To all who feel an interest in this effort, (and we believe that very many of those who have come to feel the preciousness of the soul-cheering and harmonizing truth of Life in Christ will experience an abiding and appreciative interest in the mission) we would now, simply say, that we are here on the spot. There is labor to be done; and we shall, in the name of the Lord, go about it, hoping that we may have the constant and earnest prayers of our brethren in the East for such abundant success as we believe an answer to fervent supplication will secure; and, by the blessing of God upon the humble effort, that a good harvest may be gathered of the seed which will be cast into this apparently prepared ground.

Brethren, pray for us! We believe "a great door and effectual" is opened to the truth which, though one of the latest exhibitions of scriptural doctrine, is not a lesser star in the galaxy of tenets that brightly shines upon the last-day position of the Church.

The people in this region who love the truth are ready to co-operate, and will do all they can to aid in the establishment of this great and harmonizing ground, that none but those who have the Spirit of Christ will be raised by him. He is the resurrection and the life." Can there be any "rising from the dead," without him? and can he be considered the first fruits of the wicked?

As I but imperfectly survey the field, as yet, I cannot be expected to communicate a better view to the dear friends of Christ who have felt called upon to engage in this important auxiliary to our cause.

The field is ripe for the harvest. The reapers are called to work in the name of the Lord. We feel our own inability. Nothing less than the divine arm can sustain us. With all your interest, in feeling, your good will, your material help, brethren, let there be a constant invocation of the divine blessing upon the work. Let us feel that the cause, East and West, is one. If we water we shall be watered. I cannot begin to consent that this most important and emphatic position with us, who have followed the leadings of divine light, shall decline from our neglect. Waste no small sympathy upon me, as to the peculiar circumstances of the field. I do not wish it. I am at home here. We may need farther aid. The brethren will do what they can in this county. We shall honestly tell you how we succeed. We have good heart. May we feel the solid assurance of the continued strength of the great Lord of the harvest.

REMARKS BY THE EDITOR.—Now that Br. Campbell is fairly in the field, we hope, first of all, that we shall heed his desire that much prayer shall be made to God for the divine blessing to rest on him and his labor in this Western mission. The cry has long been made from that quarter for help: at last it is in the field; but its success depends on the blessing of "the Lord of the harvest." To Him let us look for the aid so much needed; and that He would open the hearts of the people there to heed the words of truth to which His laborers may call their attention; and that He would dispose the friends of this cause east and west, to open their material stores to sustain the workmen in their work, so that they shall not be called off by the necessities of families at home. Br. Campbell ought to be kept in that Western field as long as possible; but there must be material aid, as well as prayers, to keep him there, and to extend his usefulness, Tracts and Papers, also, must be sent him to scatter gratuitously. Let us "KNOCK ON THE DEAR LORD," and put our hand to the work in earnest. If we "sow bountifully we shall also reap bountifully:" and "It is more blessed to give than to receive," said "our Lord Jesus." Do we now believe it?

Missionary Notes.

BY THOMAS W. SMITH.

NEAR GOLD FIELD, Wright Co.,
Iowa, June 10, 1865.

Had appointment at South Fork June 3d and 4th. Left home at noon of the 3d. Found that the appointment for Saturday night was not generally understood, although I had plainly stated that I would speak at that time. I therefore rode to several of the neighbors and gave notice of meeting. A goodly number were out. A Methodist preacher was present who had come on the day previous and had given out an appointment for Sunday at 11 A. M. Had some conversation with him on the subject and proposed that he should speak that evening. He objected. I then suggested that he should speak at 10 A. M. next day; but he demurred, and suggested that I should speak at 11 and he would preach at 1 o'clock. I tried to get him to preach first, but he would not; doubtless thinking there might be some reviewing to be done, in which he would not have been disappointed. I agreed to speak at 10 A. M., so to give him a couple of hours between our sermons. I announced the meeting for 10 o'clock and his at 1. I spoke on Saturday Eve. on "Israel, past, present, and future." Next morning the Methodist Sunday School met. The superintendent of which is one of the narrow minded souls occasionally found out West. He kept his school in session till 11 o'clock. I had offered to speak at 10 as a favor to their preacher, but they could not appreciate it. I then spoke till half past 12 on the Kingdom of God, the saints inheritance. I returned home after meeting to fill an appointment at Alden. I understood that he did not speak at all, half of the congregation having gone home. I had much freedom in speaking, and believe the seed sown will bring forth fruit. The Mormon Elder of whom I spoke in a former "note" preached at 2 P. M.; and I learned "pitched into us." I suppose I commenced the skirmish, as I opposed some of his notions in the morning, viz., the Mormons being the Israel of the Bible, and Zion being located in the United States. I am glad he has opposed us, for some were beginning to think they and we were of about the same faith. They hold some truth, and with that they have some plausible looking errors. And per consequence palm the whole system off as truth. But, like a well executed counterfeit note, they are the more dangerous the more they look like the genuine. The truth has no affiliation with error; and we are not willing that they shall use us as a "cat's paw to pull their chestnuts out of the fire." Six precious souls became obedient to the faith; two at South Fork, and four at Alden. Reached Alden in time for 4 P. M. service: spoke on the "Church of God and its relations." I should add that the congregations every where are increasing. South Fork nearly a score could not find room in the house. The Lord is blessing our labors. Praise his name. Pray for us.

Left home on the morning of the 8th inst.: called on Br. Hill on the way: reached Wall Lake in time for an appointment; spoke to a few assembled on the "Gospel." Left there next morning for Br. Martins': arrived during the afternoon. Ascertained the Methodist preacher had been trying to overthrow the doctrine in our absence, but made (as usual) a miserable failure; but he influenced some of his flock to stay from our meetings. Opposition from these sectarian preachers do us more good than evil, for many are led to come and hear us who might not otherwise. They want to hear for themselves. We have left scores of fellow-laborers in the shape of tracts that reveal our faith, and refute his false accusations. How valiant these champions of orthodoxy are when there is no one about to meet them, and their opponents ignorant of their attacks.

I am reminded often, by their actions, of the boy who whistled while going over the dark bridge, to keep his courage up, but scampered off at the top of his speed, when the bridge was passed, thinking the evil one was after him. We cannot get these men to come and hear us, and judge for themselves, but they depend on the representations—or, rather, the mis-representations of some of their agents—who have more bravery than themselves inasmuch as they hear us. But the same truths have met with the same reception always. As it was in the Apostle's days, so it is now. Diverse are hardened, and many oppose themselves and blaspheme. We have our mission before us, it is to sow the seed of truth; and if some hear, believe, and obey, it is well; if not, the doctrine proves a savor of death unto death. We spoke at candle light on Friday, on the saints inheritance. On Saturday on the "Gospel of Christ." On Sunday on "The Faith," and the "Way of Life." After meeting, in the afternoon, five intelligent believers became obedient to the faith. The doctrine of Life through Christ alone is progressing there. Many believe it, and some have determined to have life by becoming united to the LIFE-GIVER: to the Living Vine; and by virtue of that union partake of its life, the divine nature. We left on Monday for home, reached Br. Hills,' 10 miles from home, about 5 o'clock and remained till the next morning. I expect to visit a new field next Sunday, and week after expect to go to Tama Co., to hold a meeting of several days.

JACOB BEMIS, Wellington, Me., writes:—According to the rules of the Herald of Life the paper has come more than to cancel the cash I have paid. I am the only person in the town or county, that I know of, who believes in Life only in Christ. I am poor—have a large helpless family, and am not able to pay for the paper any longer at present. I should be glad to have it. Perhaps God has put it into the heart of some brother to continue it. If I should feel able to send a little, I will. God bless and prosper the Herald of Life. Yours, in hope of life when the great LIFE-GIVER comes.

NOTE BY EDITOR.—Your paper will be continued for the present. "The Lord will provide." Some one will see it paid for if you cannot. We believe in sending the Herald of Life to the Lord's poor, who love the truth, whether they can pay for it or not: especially those who live alone as this brother does. Let the light shine around you, Br. Bemis, whether "the darkness comprehends it or not:" we shall not labor in vain.

"PHILO." Philadelphia, Pa., writes:—Inclosed please find $10 to be applied in such manner as may best promote the cause of truth. My signature is Philo, and not "Nancy McChrist." Yours, in Christ.

NOTE BY EDITOR.—The writer of the foregoing, sent us $5 some little while since, and we credited it to "Nancy McChrist" as being the probable name; but we stand corrected; and though we know not who Philo is, the Lord knoweth, and we trust he will be rewarded for his efforts to help the truth.

MRS Z. C. CRANE, Caldwell, N. J., writes:—Find inclosed $4, which you will please appropriate towards spreading the TRUTH. Yours, in hope of the resurrection of the just.

NOTE BY EDITOR.—We thank Sister C., and trust we may so apply her bounty as not to disappoint her hopes, or defeat her intentions.

JAMES W. PURDY, Sonora, Cal., writes:—The books sent by you came safely to hand. I am very much obliged to you for sending the HERALD OF LIFE. I did not know of its existence before. I like its tone much, I would like to send you a good list of subscribers; but "no resurrection for the wicked" is considered a tremendous heresy by professed Bible believers here. May the Lord help you in your "work of faith and labor of love."

NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—Can friend Purdy tell us whether the World's Crisis, of California, has ever noticed our paper. We think not, and we seldom get a copy of it, though we have continued to send our paper as an exchange; and beside, the Publisher of that paper has never acknowledged the receipt of $20 worth of books and tracts we sent him some near two years since. True, he had them advertised in his paper as on sale at his office; but nothing more have we ever heard from him or them. We intended to have sent him more had he ever responded in relation to those sent. He may have written us; but we have not received it if he did. Is Dr. L. C. GUNN now living in Sonora? If so, will Br. Purdy tell him, we have not forgotten him and would be glad to hear from him.

A. F. SERVIS, Benton Harbor, Mich., writes:—I like the Herald much, I hope to be able to get some subscribers for your valuable paper before long. No resurrection of the wicked, is so consistent a doctrine, and so well sustained by the Bible too, that many embrace it as an essential part of the gospel of the kingdom of God. Probation, too, in the age to come, is a sentiment so God-like in its bearing upon thoughtful and humane minds, that even the unlearned concerning the purpose of God, unhesitatingly call it the gospel.

JOHN SPEIRS, No. 160, West 19th St., New York, writes:—I send you ten dollars to sustain the Herald of Life, the only paper in the world that proclaims no future life for the ungodly, thereby showing the goodness and love of God as revealed in his holy word, that He in mercy to the incorrigible sends him back to his original dust; and that the doctrine of the torment of the wicked in a future life, as held by professing Christians, is an unfounded assumption, and a dishonor to God, impeaching the goodness and love of our heavenly Father.

One credible person steadily bearing testimony to the power of divine grace in his own conversion, will have a greater effect in converting others, than the most learned and eloquent declaration of the same truth from a thousand unconverted preachers. 1 John i. 1.

CHRIST'S SYMPATHY FOR THE SORROWING.—Are you travailing with sorrow? Are you heavy-laden with the burden of oppression or woe? Christ will give you rest. Doubtless the heavy-laden with the burden of sin are first invited, but the words exclude no other suffers. There is no exception of age, or rank, or clime, the extent of the travail, or the weight of the burden; the childish sorrows of the weeping school-boy are as much the subject of the Saviour's sympathy as the matured wretchedness of the aged man; all come within the Saviour's invitation.

Responsibilities.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. He often differs from them; but believes in a free exchange of thoughts. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not: he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

OUR ISRAELITISH ORIGIN.—A work on Prophecy. It was written by Prof. WILSON, England, some years since. We republished it, believing it could not fail to interest all thinking men, whatever might be thought of the accuracy of its positions. For ourself, we indorse the general theory that the Anglo-Saxons are the literal descendants of Israel, in the line of Joseph and Ephraim. Price, 50 cents, in paper covers only. Postage 6 cents.

Books.

Notwithstanding the greatly increased price of printing materials, the only change we make in our Catalogue of prices, is, to advance BIBLE VS. TRADITION, bound, to $1: in paper cover, to 70 cents: and the amount to be pre-paid for postage, for the present, must be added on any work called for in our list of books and pamphlets. The Purchase of books and pamphlets will understand that our Catalogue, as now revised in the HERALD OF LIFE, will be our guide in all cases of sale, and that all previous ones, whether in this paper or in any works of ours containing Catalogues, are hereby revoked.

The Life & Advent Union.

Constitution of "The Life and Advent Union."

ARTICLE I. The object of this Union is to use all available means to promulgate the doctrine of Life only in Christ, the personal, proximate advent of our Lord Jesus, and all sentiments calculated to spread vital godliness.

II. Any person believing in Life through Christ alone, (thereby denying any future life to unbelievers,) and sustaining a Christian character, may become a member of this Union by subscribing to the Constitution.

III. The officers of this Union shall be a President, Vice President, Secretary, Treasurer, and seventeen Directors, who together shall constitute the Managing Board, and who are to be elected annually.

IV. The Managers shall be authorized to collect funds for the Union, which funds shall be transmitted to the Business Agent, who shall keep account of the same and transfer them to the Treasurer.

V. The Members of the Board of Directors shall constitute a Committee in their several districts to transact all business pertaining to the Union in their several localities.

VI. The Annual meeting and such other meetings as may be deemed necessary by the Board of Managers, shall be called by giving three weeks' notice.

VII. The Secretary shall keep a record of the names and post-office addresses of the members.

VIII. This Constitution may be amended by a two-thirds vote at any Annual meeting.

NOTE.—This organization is in no sense a Church. It is simply a Union for the specific purpose of issuing, through the use of the press, such periodicals and other works as shall spread what we regard the truth of God. All persons are welcome to work with us, even though they differ from us in their views on some points: but the Union, by the 2nd Article, intended to guard against being thwarted in their design by votes of persons adverse to its object.—ED. SIX SERMONS on the inquiry, Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the Life-giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by GEO. STORRS; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This word contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in plain binding, 50 cents; in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near ten years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER: OR, MAN IN DEATH; AND THE HOPE FOR A FUTURE LIFE.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead, can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD; OR, THE RIGHTEOUS ONLY WILL LIVE AGAIN. By GEO. STORRS. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the EDITOR of the HERALD OF LIFE. Price, $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.—IMMORTALITY: The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev, T. M. POST, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by GEO. STORRS. Price in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. POST, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a Prize Essay on IMMORTALITY, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men, without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. POST took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The REVIEWER followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The Author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

BIBLE VS. TRADITION: in which the True Teaching of the Bible is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity Life, Death, &c. Price, bound, $1. Postage 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. It is a work of much labor and research. The title indicates its object, and the performance shows the object was kept in view throughout. The language is sometimes severe on what is called "orthodoxy—more so than is desirable—but the value of the work, in general, cannot be over-estimated. Thousands of it have been sent abroad, and thousand more ought to be scattered. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subjects; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

THE BLESSED HOPE.

BY T. W. SMITH.

There is a world so pure and fair—
O so bright: O so bright;
And all may in its glory share—
O so bright: O so bright.
No discord there its peace shall mar,
And angry strife and cruel war,
Shall on the earth prevail no more.

Jesus shall have his reign begun—
Peaceful hour: Peaceful hour;
And Gentile times their course have run—
Peaceful hour: Peaceful hour;
And conflicts then will be no more;
Death's cruel sway will then be o'er,
Life shines bright on "the evergreen shore"—
Peaceful hour: Peaceful hour.

Though it is now a darksome night,
There is light: There is light;
And 'tis the hour of Gentile might—
There is light: There is light;
The dazzling light of coming day,
Will scatter all these clouds away,
Nor will that hour be long delayed—
There is light: There is light.

Paradise revived, restored—
Blest abode: Blest abode;
There saints shall live with Christ their Lord—
Blest abode: Blest abode;
When God's own hand shall dry the tears
From every eye, and quell the fears
That pained the heart in by gone years—
Blest abode: Blest abode.

And cruel beasts will then be mild—
All is peace: All is peace;
And heed the leading of a child—
All is peace: All is peace;
The wolf shall with the lamb now rest,
The kid shall be the leopard's guest,
Nor will the lion the calf molest—
All is peace: All is peace.

Blest Saviour come to earth again—
Saviour come: Saviour come;
Come, for 'tis thy right to reign—
Saviour come: Saviour come;
Come chase away the gloom of night,
And let us see thee in the light;
O come with all thy glory bright—
Saviour come: Saviour come.

Children's Department.

TO THE CHILDREN.

Well, little friends, you looked in vain last week for the "CHILDREN'S DEPARTMENT;" for, by some hocuspocus your department got headed "LETTERS AND EXTRACTS." Sure enough, there were letters and extracts that went to make up the story; and we trust you have all read them. As a little atonement we will give you the answer to the ENIGMA of week before last, which none of you have responded to. Here it is:

LITTLE EDDIE.

"O, mamma, mamma!" cried little Eddie one day as he bounded into the back parlor; "dear mamma, the brook has gone to sleep in the day time!"

"It is frozen, my dear," replied the mother, with a smile.

"Maybe it is frozen," said little Eddie, thoughtfully; "but I guess it's asleep, too, for it lies ever so still, and don't dance and sing over the pebbles as it did yesterday."

The mother smiled at the queer but pretty conceit of the little one, and smoothing his golden locks caressingly, she imprinted a kiss upon his rosy cheek.

Every day now little Eddie watched the brook to see it wake up, but winter had fairly come, and though the sun smiled warmly down upon it some times, and seemed to kiss it coaxingly, it slept on.

December, January, and February passed, and the child kept saying, "O, mamma, I wish the brook would wake up, for I want to see it dance and hear it sing once more.

And all this time the roses in Eddie's cheek grew pale, and the light in his sweet eyes grew dim, for insidious disease, which no doctor's skill could remove, had fastened upon his vitals. It was a sad blow to the fond parents when they knew that their darling boy, their only and much loved one, must die; but they were true Christians, and they bowed humbly beneath the rod. Through all the boisterous days of March they watched over him, hoping to prolong his precious life by their loving care; but when April came with its sunshine and showers, and woke the sleeping rivulet, with its warm breath, and kissed the flowers along the margin into life, little Eddie was too weak and ill to go out.

One morning as he lay by the open window, he said, "It is very pleasant to hear the little brook, but, mamma, I do wish I could see it just once more. And the fond mother rose and wrapped a robe round his delicate form, and then the father took him in his great strong arms and went down to the little brook, where the early violets were in bloom, and the golden dandelions gleamed like stars, among the emerald-green. Eddie was delighted, and clapped his tiny hands with many expressions of joy; then suddenly he grew very quiet, and said thoughtfully, "Mamma, I am going to sleep, and will I wake again like this brook?"

"Certainly, my dear," said the mother, softly, and with tears in her eyes.

A sweet smile went over the child's white lips. And when they carried him in and laid him upon his little bed, and the death angel came and soothed him to sleep, the beautiful smile still rested there, like a glory from the other world.

Softly the sexton lifted the violet-gemmed turf in a quiet nook by the brookside, and loving hands lowered the tiny coffin to its last resting place. Then the birds sang sweetly in the willow branches overhead, the little brook murmured a cheerful tune as it glided over the white pebbles, and everything seemed to say, "Weep not, but rejoice; for though he sleeps now, your loved one will wake again in the morning; in the resurrection morning!"—Christian Advocate.

THE BOY AND THE BEE.

Little Johnnie was just three years old. Of course, he had seen very little of the world, and had much to learn. So one warm, bright afternoon, while playing in the garden, he took a lesson which he remembers yet.

In the rich green grass, a bright yellow dandelion caught his eye, but he did not notice a singular looking spot about the middle of the flower. That spot was nothing less than a merry honey bee, who came singing along through the air in search of honey and wax, and stopped to see if that flower had any for him. Quck as thought, down went the little fat hand, and back it came again as quickly, bringing in its grasp flower, bee and all.

The poor bee was very much surprised at this sudden change. He thought the sky or something else had fallen on him. But whatever might have been the case, he was resolved not to give up this life without a trial, and so, twisting his little body around, he sent up his sharp, poisoned sting deep into Johnnie's hand. And didn't nurse hear a scream from Johnnie's lungs? And while she ran to aid the suffering child, the bee gathered himself up and set out for home, wondering what in the world such little two-legged pests as boys were made for.

But the sting had not only marked Johnnie's hand, but had written this lesson in his memory—that some times very pretty things have very sharp stings.

Wine looks very pretty in the glass; but the Bible says that if we become fond of drinking it, it will "bite like a serpent and sting like an adder."

Sin often looks very inviting, but the Bible tells us that "the sting of death is sin."

A little boy once asked his mother for a peach. She asked him if he had not already eaten one. To get another, he told a lie, and said "No." But after he went to bed that lie stung him so that he was afraid to go to sleep till he had called his mother, confessed his sin, and asked her pardon.

I hope my young readers will remember that some times very pretty things have very sharp stings.—Child's Own Magazine.

OUT OF THE MOUTH OF BABES.

When Mr. Whitefield was preaching in New England, a lady became the subject of divine grace, and her spirit was peculiarly drawn out in prayer for others. She could persuade no one to pray with her but her little daughter, about ten years of age. After a time, it pleased God to touch the heart of the child, and give her the hope of salvation. In a transport of holy joy she then exclaimed:

"O, mother, if all the world knew this! I wish I could tell every body. Pray, mother, let me run to some of the neighbors and tell them, that they may be happy and love my Saviour."

"Ah, my child," said the mother, "that would be useless, for I suppose that were you to tell your experience, there is not one within many miles who would not laugh at you, and say it was all a delusion."

"O, mother," replied the little girl, "I think they would believe me. I must go over to the shoemaker and tell him; he will believe me."

She ran over, and found him at work in his shop. She began by telling him that he must die, and he was a sinner, and that she was a sinner, but that her blessed Saviour had heard her mother's prayers, and had forgiven her all her sins; and that now she was so happy she did not know how to tell it.

The shoemaker was struck with surprise, and his tears flowed down like rain; he threw aside his work, and by prayer and supplication sought mercy. The neighborhood was awakened, and within a few months more than fifty persons were brought to the knowledge of Jesus and rejoiced in the power of his grace. —S. S. Visitor.

MISSION TO THE COLORED PEOPLE.

How often, as we gather in Sunday school, do we wish our house was twice as large. At 10 o'clock, nearly every child is there with clean, nice clothes, tasty hats, and those whose parents are able, come with snow white dresses, a broad sash of ribbon, nice gaiters, and as they greet us with their sunny faces all beaming with affection, and radiant joy, as happy as a spring squirrel and nearly as lively, we forget that we are white, and think that they are our own dear children. Some are always dressed like dolls at church or school. They think much of dress, and as they grow older they cover their fingers with rings, and hang Attleboro jewelry around them as much as possible. Most of the large girls wear earrings. They are very nimble with the rope, and make much noise at play. Mirthfulness predominates in most. They are quite sensitive, yet when punished seldom show any signs of feeling, but as soon as it is over they take on bitterly. Some of the children are as white as any children at the North. I cannot see the least mark of the race upon them. Others are brunetts, and usually good looking, with a quick, impetuous temper, and every mark of ability, full, high forehead, black, nearly straight hair, compressed lips, splendid teeth, smooth, clear skin; usually the most capable of the race. We have besides these, the darker faces, with less white blood flowing in their veins. In these, there is a vast difference in ability. These are of the African stock....Owing to constant mingling with Northern soldiers, and from their large imitation, they speak quite like others, and seldom use "dat" for that. We notice more of the old people use that peculiar phraseology. They have comparative terms peculiar to themselves. Whatever is of an enterprising nature is "right smart." To be sick is being "under the weather." Pain is termed misery, we frequently hear of "misery in my head," or oftner "misery in my side." All adjectives concentrate in "heaps." Thus if a man is better he is "heaps better."

They are very ignorant of all scientific facts, not knowing the shape or motion of the earth, or have the slightest idea of the geography of the country, yet when told, eagerly catch the idea, and are so much pleased to find out that they do not soon forget.

Our school now numbers nearly 160 scholars, with an average attendance of 135, old and young. In Br. Leslie's absence, we found it impossile to do justice to so many. This led us to adopt a nice plan, that the children like much, and has proved a great help to them, as well as to us. Our school-house is situated among large, shady trees. Under these trees we send out classes to recite to advanced scholars. Our programme allows thirty minutes to each class, so that every half hour we send out five classes, averaging eight to a class....Since we have commenced, schools have started up all around us. Even Catholics now have one. We hear of some criticisms on our school, and last week I received an instructing note from the former mistress of one of our scholars. I took no notice of it. Within three months, some of our children have passed from the alphabet to become fair readers of the Bible. They are learning to write quite prettily on their slates, and are getting hold of arithmetic. They are very practical, for if they cannot answer a question from the book, yet if the same question is made to cover their dealings in marbles or marketing, they at once answer correctly.

This people are answering the knotty question and settling the problem of their maintenance in freedom. There is not a trade or art but what is represented by them. Saturday last, I saw a colored mason, evidently in charge of the erection of a brick building. They are tin-workers, carpenters, farmers and gardeners, and as near as I can learn, their former masters left nearly all the farms and shops to them, while they were hunting or visiting. I consider that the real practical knowledge of every day matter in the South, is among the blacks.

They are now publishing a paper, advocating the rights of suffrage and other points essential to their interests, in their new emerging to the life of liberty and peace. Glorious is the peace that seems to come like angel's voices from every breeze. The North have lost sons dear to hearts and homes, but no more. This country has lost sons, business, hopes and credit. Desolation reigns broad spread, as far as the legions of war have tramped. A night of darkness was fast settling over this guilty South. No life was safe. Prostration and famine stared all in the face; yet gleams of prophetic light shone through the dark clouds as faith claimed God's help, and many a prayer, "How long, O Lord," found a promise of speedy relief. Yet at last, although the prayers of the millions of enslaved ones had gone up to the God of Sabbaoth, the cheering hope of peace come to them as an unexpected blessing, not in the fact of it, but in the time of it. Yes, the sad war is over; everything is brightening. Thronging multitudes of rebel soldiers pass through Nashville on the way to their homes. They are all about us in our village, but they are subdued; they seem doubly afflicted, they have not only lost much by a foolish scheme, but their best friend to help them out of their difficulty, has fallen by the hand of an assassin. They say they are glad to get home, and they will now respect the North as much as they despised it before. It will take a long time to settle the sediments that have been thrown up to the surface by convulsion of the undercurrent of disaffection and rebellion, but time settles all things, and it is only a question of time in regard to the settlement of all the startling phenomena of these last days.

We have selected six Christian teachers from our school who can read, as Sunday school teachers. We previously instruct them on the lesson, and give them thirty minutes to converse with their classes. At the close, I ask the entire school questions on the lesson. They are delighted with this, and we are getting much Scripture knowledge before them. They enjoy singing much, and we attend especially to it.

Our morning prayer meeting was interesting. When we first came, we found that long hymns and exhortations were in vogue. Now all take hold, each saying a few words, and a few verses interspersed. As soon as one prayer was finished, they were accustomed to arise instantly from their knees. It is now different, all waiting a moment to see if another wished to pray. Our friends are in good working order; they like to be told somewhat how to go on, and then drive on with all their native eloquence and energy.

PERPETUAL TRUTH OF THE SCRIPTURES.

There is something grand and divine in the perpetual and universal truth of the word of God. Take an admired passage of one of the great poets of ancient times. It is local. It bears the imprint of the age, the race, and the state of the society in which it was produced, and its truth is some-how circumscribed limited by those conditions. But take for example the 90th Psalm, one of the oldest works of the human mind, dating more than 500 hundred years before Homer. Every verse of it is true, not only then, but now and in all ages.

The "prayer of Moses, the man of God," is a most appropriate and comprehensive prayer at the present day, and may be offered up by the devout soul as a fit and full expression of his thoughts, emotions and desires. These are thoughts of Him "who inhabiteth eternity." They are conceived at an elevation which exalts them far above the changing objects, persons, scenes and events of earth and time. They shine down upon this world like fixed stars, unvarying in their position, and undimmed in their light. It is well to be conversant with thoughts thus immutable and sublime. The familiar contemplation and rumination of them expands, exalts and strengthens the mind. It lifts us above our own age into the clear and cloudless regions of unchangeable truth; the aeronaut while he is passing through the clouds is swept this way and that by gusts and currents of wind, drenched in vapor, pelted by hail, and deafened by thunders, but when he emerges beyond them, reaches a clear and untroubled region, so the soul uplifted by contemplation and faith, may leave the earth, break through the clouds which environ it, and dwell in a bright and serene atmosphere, above the reach of those passions, cares and controversies which perplex the region below. O! blessed be God, who has prepared such an element for us storm-tossed mortals in his holy word, and given us wings to rise to it.

PICTURE OF SIN.

Look now at sin; pluck off that painted mask and turn upon her face the lamp of the Bible. We start; it reveals a death's head. I stay not to quote texts descriptive of sin; it is a debt, a burden, a thief, a sickness, a leprosy, a plague, a poison, a serpent, a sting,—everything that man hates it is, a load of evils beneath whose most crushing, intolerable pressure "the whole creation groaneth." Name me the evil that springs not from this root—the crime that lies not at this door. Who is the hoary sexton that digs man his grave? Who is the painted temptress that steals his virtue? Who is the murderess that destroys his life? Who is the sorceress that first deceives and then destroys the soul?—Sin! Who with icy breath, blights the sweet blossoms of youth? Who breaks the hearts of parents? Who brings gray hairs with sorrow to the grave? Who, by a more hideous metamorphosis than Ovid ever fancied, changed sweet children into vipers, tender mothers into monsters, and their fathers into worse than Herods, the murderers of their innocents?—Sin! Who casts the apple of discord on home hearths? Who lights the torch of war and carries it over happy lands? Who by divisions in the Church, rends Christ's seamless robe?—Sin! Who is the Delilah that sings the Nazarite asleep, and delivers the strength of God into the hands of the uncircumcised? Who with smiles on her face, and honeyed flattery on her tongue, stands in the door to offer sacred rites of hospitality, and when suspicion sleeps pierces our temple with a nail? What Siren is this, who, seated on a rock by the deadly pool, smiles to deceive, sings to lure, kisses to betray, and flings her arms around our neck, to leap with us into perdition? —Sin! Who petrifies the soft and gentle heart, hurls reason from her throne, and impels sinners, mad as Gadarene swine, down the precipice into the lake of fire?—Sin! Who having brought the criminal to the gallows, persuades him to refuse a pardon, and with his own hand to bar the door against the messenger of mercy? What witch of hell is it that bewitches us?—Who nailed the Son of God to that bloody tree? and who as it were, not a dove descending with the olive, but a vulture swooping down to devour, vexes, grieves, thwarts, repels, drives off the Spirit of God? Who is it that makes man in his heart and habits baser than a beast; and him who was once but little lower than an angel, but little better than a devil?—Sin! Sin! thou art a hateful and horrible thing; that "abominable thing which God hates." And what wonder? Thou hast insulted his Holy Majesty; thou hast bereaved him of beloved children; thou hast crucified the Son of his infinite love; thou hast vexed his gracious Spirit; thou hast defied his power; thou hast despised his grace; and in the body and blood of Jesus, as if that were a common thing, thou hast trodden under foot his matchless mercy. Surely, brethren, the wonder of wonders is, that sin is not that abominable thing which we also hate.—Dr. Guthrie.

THE PRESENCE OF GOD.

Nothing is more agreeable to a parent than that his son should desire his society. When a son desires to avoid his father's presence, it is a sign that he has violated his obligations or is wanting filial affection. When a son prizes above all other society that of his wise and affection father, there is reason to hope that he will not only make glad his father, but serve his generation according to the will of God.

Christians should desire above everything else the presence of their heavenly Father. It should be the first object of their most importunate petition. Nothing can be more pleasing to our heavenly Father than that we should prize his presence above all other things. No petition can be more in accordance with his will, than the petition for His presence. Hence the petition may be presented with boldness, for we know that we shall receive when we ask in accordance with his will.

If we do not desire the presence of God, then we have no true filial feelings and are not his children, but the children of the wicked one.

It becomes us, then, to inquire whether we have any true desire for the presence of God? It is not necessary to define what is meant by the expression, "the presence of God." No definition can make it known to one that has had no experience of it.

We have the desires for the presence of beloved earthly friends. When they are away, how long the days, how lonely the nights, how earnest the desire for their presence! Have we any similiar desires with respect to the Friend who sticketh closer than a brother? When his presence is not with us, do the days seem long and the nights lonely? Is his presence and smile necessary to our happiness? Oh, do we really desire the presence of God? When we pray for it, do we pray for a felt reality, or do we repeat a form of words? Do we long for the presence of an absent God, as affectionate children long for the presence of an absent parent.

If so, then let us pray for it with all importunity. As we have already said no prayer can be more acceptable to God. And no prayer can be more condusive to our salvation. Sin is the only thing which can put our salvation in peril. And what can restrain us from sin like the presence of God?

The Christian sins through forgetfulness of God. He cannot go directly against the clearly perceived, distinctly remembered command of God. He who sins in that way is of the devil. The Christian when he sins is deceived, in consequence of the influence of passion, or the power of the tempter. The tempter cannot follow him in the presence of God. While there he is safe from his assaults. While there he sees every duty in a clear light. While there the desire for sin is banished, The presence of God is the most perfect safe-guard against sin.—N. Y. Observer.

THE SOULS UNDER THE ALTAR.

The text Rev. vi. 9, 10 is supposed to teach that the dead are in a conscious state. Let us see. These were "the souls of them that were slain for the word of God, and for the testimony which they held." They were righteous. Then they never made such a prayer or cry as represented in the 10th verse; and there must be some general misunderstanding of the text. We are commanded to love our enemies, and to pray for them that despitefully use us; to bless them that curse us, do good to them that hate us, &c. And Christ left us the glorious example as well as the precept. He died interceding with the Father to forgive his murderers, even amidst their insults. How then could these righteous dead ones, under the altar, cry for the vengence of God to overtake their enemies, in such glaring contradiction to the teaching of the Holy Spirit? They certainly could not; and the text must not be so understood as to make void the precepts and example of our blessed Lord and Master.

How then shall we understand the text? The souls under the altar, or as is elsewhere often translated, the persons of them that were slain, &c Now there is no figure of speech more common than the one that makes inanimate objects speak, and often act; as the trees clapped their hands, the hills skipped like lambs; the blood of Abel cried to God for vengence. That will do; for vengence is mine, saith the Lord, and I will repay. But Abel himself, as a righteous man, could not cry to God for vengence on his brother; but if conscious he should pray to God to forgive him his foul murder. But his blood, or to take off the figure, the circumstance of his murder would cry to God for vengeance on his brother, the murderer. So of the individuals seen by John in vision; being slain for the testimony they bore, was a circumstance that cried with a loud voice to God for vengeance; yet there is no better evidence that they were alive after they were dead, than there is that the blood of Abel was alive and had a voice and spoke after Abel was dead; or that the blood of Christ was alive and had a voice, because it is said to speak better things than the blood of Abel; or that the grave-stones are alive and have a voice, because we say they speak the mortality of man. Now since John wrote there have been millions slain for the testimony which they bore. No wonder that John foreseeing it, should, by the usual figure of speech, say they cried with a loud voice; how long ere their blood would be avenged

A PROFITABLE MISTAKE.

One day, as Felix Neff was walking in Lausanne, he saw at a distance before him, a man whom he took for one of his friends. He made up to him, tapped him on the shoulder, and before looking him in the face, asked him: "How does your soul prosper, my friend?"

The stranger immediately turned round and looked at him in surprise. Neff perceived his mistake, apologized, and went his way. About three or four years afterward a person came to Neff, and introducing himself, said he was indebted to him for his inestimable kindness. Neff did not recognize the man, and begged that he would explain himself. The stranger replied:

"Have you forgotten a certain person whose shoulder you once touched in one of the streets of Lausanne, and whom you asked: 'How does your soul prosper?' It was I. Your inquiry led me to serious reflection, and now I find it is well with my soul."

"Lo, all these things worketh God often times with man, to bring back his soul from the pit, to be enlightened with the light of the living." Job. xxxiii. 29, 30.

"The passage (Matt. x. 28,) 'fear not them which kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul,' I had not adverted to, from not supposing it to have any connection with the present subject; nor can I now perceive any; but as the learned Whitby, in his extreme anxiety to prove from Scriptures a separate state of consciousness, has in his Commentary so applied this text, it is due to such an authority briefly to mention it. He does not seem, however, to have written in this place with his usual judgment.

"The expression of Jesus to his disciples was manifestly intended to remind them that their enemies could only inflict temporal death, —could only put an end to a man's life in this world; whereas God's power extends to the whole of our existence,—to all eternity:—in the next world as well as in this. The question about the intermediate condition between death and the resurrection, evidently was not at all in his mind. But Whitby imagines Him to imply that the soul never can be in an unconscious state, because then it would be killed; 'for,' says he, 'tis not easy to perceive how an intelligible, thinking, and perceiving Being can be more killed than by depriving it of all sensation, thought, and perception.' He did not recollect that it is a thing of every day's occurrence for a man to receive, for instance, a stunning blow, which for some minutes deprives him of all sensation, &c., though he afterwards recovers; yet we should not say that the person inflicting such a blow had killed the other's soul, any more than to leave him in the dark for some time would be the same thing as to destroy his eyes. But Whitby does not in general reason in this manner."

MATERIALISM.—It is remarkable that a great part of mankind, and those not least, who profess to hold, not only the distinct nature of the soul from any material substance, but even its power of continuing active and conscious when disunited from matter, are nevertheless altogether materialists, and mean by a spirit only some thin and delicate kind of matter, like a cloud, or a ray of light, &c., which is an object of the senses, but not of all the senses. This is plainly the case, not only with those who believe in the common stories of ghosts (that is, spirits) appearing and speaking, but also with those who, though they disbelieve these accounts, yet perceive nothing contradictory and inconceivable in the idea of the appearing of a spirit; which of course would be to them mere words without meaning, if they understood by "spirit" something which does not consit of matter, and consequently cannot have (as a visible object must) shape, height, color, &c.

Whatever is actually seen, or presented to any of the senses, whether naturally or supernaturally, must of course be material; but a like effect may be produced on the mind (as we experience in the case of imagination and dreaming, and, as we read, in the case of visions) without the presence (as far as we know) of any material object. And the inaccuracy of common language, when we are speaking of such things, perhaps tends to confuse our thoughts. Thus we say, indifferently, "I saw in my sleep this or that," or "I dreamed that I saw it:" the former expression, interpreted literally, would imply the presence of a material object; the latter, not.—Bishop Whately.

THE WESTERN MISSION.—NO. 2.

FROM W. S. CAMPBELL.

Up to this time (June 20th) I have been engaged in pastoral labor—the parish, as you have been informed, comprising a whole county—the brethren, who live scattered around in "the timber" and on prairies, being quite pleased to see me and hear me converse upon great bible topics. I have not yet been far from Otto; and it would not be advisable, since our second meeting begins to morrow, at Summum, where it is said we may expect a larger and better turn out than we had at Brown's Grove. But thus far, I find that the man who labors in this field must be found very considerably "on his muscle."

To attempt to walk several miles, as one must sometimes, to visit these lovers of the truth in such weather as this, (for it is very hot), in the first place demands considerable resolution, since we must wind up the bluff, and after passing the openings, plod on our weary way over the dusty prairie-road, with the sun, at mid-day, scorching, and drought consuming us. Then it requires perseverance. Yesterday we went four miles thus; and after visiting about the village of Summum, went about another; then returning to the village to a meeting, we neglected to "blaze the tree;" and hence, it being very dark, upon our return to lodgings, we got lost. Yet nothing very serious occurred till we found "a vast" of hospitality at Br. Norton's. In the morning, there having been a heavy shower, we found a new difficulty; literally, taking some pounds of black mud on our boots every few steps, as we bent our way back to "Head quarters."

There is a habit, I am told, prevalent in this part, of taking only the New Testament as the necessary and important revelation. This is insisted upon by the preachers, who persuade the people, who are but little accustomed to study the word, that the Old Testament is now useless; that it belongs to a past dispensation; and as the New should contain all the rules of life, we should not trouble ourselves about what the Old contains. This appears quite plausible; especially to those who have no interest in studying the word, and no idea of the necessity of faith in God's great plan of mercy. Said one brother to me, whose heart is now warm in his first love, They take out a little bit of a testament and make the people believe that is all the Bible we have, and all we want. Hence the ignorant are kept quiet as to prophecy and all the testimony upon man in death, the penalty of sin, and more especially the great proceedure of Jehovah in his work of judgment. They see nothing of these things.

I question whether the preachers themselves know any better. I discover that there is hardly any true conception of faith. Well there may be neither the conception nor the faith, for the preaching is all of that practical kind, (but very impracticable) which ignores divine doctrine; like that which is now, by certain parties, prated so much about in the East, to the neglect of the real ground of justification. Many of the Advent preachers, in rejecting the doctrine of Life, reject the gospel truth of justification, and preach that men are to be saved by doing; all the progress, victory, and preparation for the future glory that may be secured hereafter, is by doing what will give the victory in detail. But then, some of them have become such masters of this science that they can tell us in detail how they have mastered themselves, and how we must succeed. But, "this is the victory that overcometh the world, even your faith." To suppose men can have faith without doctrine, is to expect to to believe without hearing; to preach without being sent.

Yet to do that which is called preaching, by many, with no great truth of scripture set forth, has become very popular, and in the same proportion done vast injury. But men can be led to speak in meeting, go into the water, and have a good, exciting, crying time, periodically, by this means.

Out here, it is "doing," in preaching; eternally, "doing the work." It strikes me that it can be neither law nor gospel. It certainly does not teach justification by faith. It is not a legal justification, for it does not specify the law, nor yet the acts, which are to be performed. It presents that all the faith a man should have is his apprehension before he repents; therefore his conversion is his own work; that leaves the act of baptism (his own work) the form of regeneration. One thing is patent, at least, that the necesity of faith appears not in this class of labor, East or West, and the word is left out, that human tradition and commandments of men may come in.

The meeting at Brown's grove was very interesting indeed. A large number came to hear the word, considering that it is not very thickly settled on the ridge. A general interest in the region is awakened. Good, great good, has certainly been accomplished by the effort. We think the demands of that part of the field require that we should commence another meeting there in a few weeks, and we intend to, if God permit; then, we believe, a much larger number will be present, and hope the impression of the truth will be much more extensive.

Br. W. S. Campbell's P. O. address, for the next two or three weeks, will be, Lewistown, Fulton Co., Ills.—Editor.

STRAIGHT ON TO ROMANISM.

To where? To "Romanism." Some years since a work was published exhibiting the "Demoralizing Influences of Popery." A chapter was devoted to the "Tendencies of Romish Literature," one paragraph of which read as follows:

"Among the late perverts to Rome of high degree, we find chronicled the name of Lady Georgianna Fullerton, sister to Lord Grenville, and author of "Ellen Middleton." After reading this exciting novel, and observing the peculiar cast of thought and train of remark when adverting to religious exercises and duties, we were not surprised to learn that our authoress had become a full convert to superstition, and at last entered the mystical precincts of Rome. When we see Alice bowing in her closet before a picture of our Saviour, and then holding up the crucifix before the eyes of her dying husband; when we see what sacredness, awe, and efficacy, are attributed to the act of confession to a priest; when we hear Mrs. Tracy, heretofore the deadly enemy of Ellen Middleton, kneeling at her bed side, in hardly articulate tones saying to her, 'Pray for me when you are in heaven;' finally, when we hear Ellen's speech to her husband, in which she says: 'There is a blessed communion in which we both believe, between those who rest in heaven, and those who struggle on earth; you will pray for me when I am gone; and I will pray for you where I go;' who can doubt that the writer's mind was already enslaved to Romanism?"

And could not the Protestant Editor, "Rev. C. Sparry," see, and "who can doubt, that the" theory of an immortal soul was what led Lady Fullerton straight down the gulph to Romanism; where thousands and tens of thousands more have gone and are going? Had Lady Fullerton fully believed the bible truth, "the dead praise not the Lord"—"the dead know not anything," does the "Rev. Editor," himself, believe she would have found an open door into "Romanism?" She honestly followed out the theory of inherent immortality. Its legitimate landing place is Romanism or Restorationism. Lady Fullerton landed in the former, and Bishop Newton in the latter.

Will Mr. Sparry, or any one else, show us, if they can, the impropriety of asking a dying saint to "pray for" us when they "get to heaven"—or, for that dying saint to say, "I will pray for you where I go," on the supposition that the dead do know "more than all the world," and are alive in the presence of God? Are they less holy there than while here? Are they less interested for friends left behind when they get to heaven than while they were with them on earth? Have they less access to God there than here? If it is answered—"Christ is the Intercessor there"—We answer—He is no more the Intercessor after saints die than before; and we are commanded to pray for one another; and we know of no Protestant that hesitates to ask a Christian to pray for him. Paul himself said—"Brethren, pray for me." It may be said—"True; we should pray for each other while here." We reply—Paul said, "I will that men pray everywhere." It may be said again,—"Paul did not mean when they were dead." He said, "Everywhere;" and from that obligation it is for our opponents to show they are released by death, unless they are unconscious, and therefore incapable of the act. But the objector may say, "We have no Scripture example of living saints asking dying ones to pray for them when they get to heaven." We answer—"Thou hast said truly;" and the reason is obvious—the Bible saints understood that there is no knowledge in sheol, the invisible state, where their dying friends were going; their hope, their one and only hope was in the resurrection; the pagan fable had not obtained among them, that the soul is immortal: they understood their friends were "silent in the grave." But when the heathen superstition of "disembodied spirits"—"the soul immortal"—"the dead know more than all the world," stole into the church, then her communicants, who embraced this "vain philosophy," were fully prepared to slide into praying to saints—from that to a purgatory—and then into "Romanism" fully developed, or the "man of sin" large as life. No wonder Protestants have made so poor a stand against Romanism. Ever since Luther, by the persuasion of his brother Reformers, was tempted, and fell by the temptation, and gave up, or consented to hide his light on the subject of the non-immortality of the soul, Romanism has marched onward and "prevailed," and will prevail till the doctrine of man's natural, or inherent immortality is once more firmly placed where Luther placed it at the commencement of the reformation, among the "Roman dunghill of decretals." It has no higher authority. The council of Lateran, under Pope Leo X. passed the following "Canon:"—

"Some have dared to assert concerning the nature of the reasonable soul, that it is mortal; we with the approbation of the sacred council do condemn and reprobate all such, seeing, according to the canon of Pope Clement the Fifth, that the soul is immortal: and we strictly inhibit all from dogmatizing otherwise: and we decree, that all who adhere to the like erroneous assertions, shall be shunned and punished as heretics."—Caranza, page 412—1681.

This canon shows that the doctrine of an "immortal soul," that lives when the man is dead, was supported in those days, as it generally has been since, by the authority of Creeds, rather than by the truth of God. Bishop Tillotson says, in his Sermon, Vol. 2, printed 1774, "The immortality of the soul is rather supposed, or taken for granted, than expressly revealed in the Bible."

Do we not well say then—The tendencies of the immortal soul theory, is to lead men to reverence the creeds of men more than the Bible—their declaration of sentiments—their priestly domination, and hence to go straight forward into Romanism? The author of the work, we have referred to, tells us, p. 23:

"A court-lady, daughter of the Earl of Devonshire, having embraced the catholic religion, (in the reign of Charles I.) was asked by Laud the reason of her conversion. 'It is chiefly,' said she, 'because I hate to travel in a crowd.' Being desired to explain her meaning, she replied: 'I perceive your grace, (Laud) and many others are making haste to Rome, and therefore, in order to prevent being crowded, I have gone before you."

Multitudes of Protestants, in England and elsewhere, have gone to the Romish religion, because the Reformers did not maintain the principle of Luther when he first saw clearly the light, that the doctrine of an inherent immortal soul was only a "Roman dunghill decretal:" and multitudes more, in this country, will land there, if this age continues much longer, some of whom make great displays of zeal against her at present. The reason is, they hold substantially with Rome in her pagan fable of the consciousness of dead men.

"THE SANDS OF TIME." NO. 1.

It is astonishing to see how reckless men can be in matters of great moment. One would suppose that however carefully they act in little every-day affairs, they would treat more important things in a better way. But in many cases the very opposite course is taken; the weight of the subject is indicated by the degree of heedlessness manifested by those who handle it. The agitation of time theories furnishes as good an illustration of what we say as can be obtained. Men scour the country with a pertinacity that would be praiseworthy if they were engaged in a legitimate work, but as they merely labor to propagate "that which satisfieth not," they merit nothing but reproof. They are sand-peddlers, and those who receive their teachings build on the sand. The first theory is that which claims that the Second Advent of Christ will take place about the year of the world 6000, and that the said year synchronizes with A. D. 1868. We claim that this theory is sandy, first, because it has not a word of Scripture in its favor. The Bible no where intimates that the end of this age will transpire at the expiration of 6000 years. What the Bible does not recognize cannot be allowed as safe materia to build on. Our second reason is that the weight of chronological evidence shows that the world is already more than 6000 years old. There are two great sources of evidence concerning the age of the world—the Hebrew Scriptures, and the Septuagint version of the Hebrew Scriptures. There is a great difference between these two documents as to chronology. According to the latter, the world reached its sixth thousandth year in the sixth century of the Christan Era, twelve hundred years ago. "The larger chronology of the Septuagint," says George Rawlinson, "would ....even if it stood alone, have as good a claim as the shorter one of the Hebrew text, to be considered the Chronology of Scripture. It does not, however, stand alone. For the period between the Flood and Abraham, the Septuagint has the support of another ancient and independent version,—the Samaritan.... There is no....very ready mode of accounting for the identity of the numbers in the two versions, but by supposing that they are the real numbers of the original. This identity ....furnishes a solid ground for preferring, apart from all historical considerations, that longer system of Biblical Chronology with which Egyptian and all other profane history is found to be in accordance."—Aids to Faith.

"The chronology, especially in the ages of some of the ante and post-diluvian patriarchs, is very different in the Hebrew text, the Samaritan, the Septuagint, and Josephus. The Septuagint adds one hundred years to each of the patriarchs Adam, Seth, Enos, Canian, Mahalaleel, and Enoch before the birth of their sons; while they take twenty from the age of Methusaleh, and add six to that of Lamech. Thus the space from the creation to the deluge is made 2242 years, according to the Vatican copy, but 2262, according to the Alexandrine; and the sum total according to Josephus is 2265; according to the Samaritan 1307, and the Hebrew text 1656. The sum total from the Deluge to the 70th year of Terah, according to these authorities, is, Heb. 292; Sam. 942; Sept. Vat. 1172; Alex. 1072, and Josephus 1002."—Bagster's Comprehensive Bible.

Thus the weight of evidence is against the theory that the world has yet to reach its Sixth thousandth year, and we declare the theory to be nothing but sand. We repeat our two reasons. First, the Bible does not teach that the Second Advent of Christ will take place at the expiration of six thousand years in the world's history. Secondly the evidence is in favor of the Septuagint, and against the Hebrew chronology; which puts the 6000 years far in the past. In the sixth century, there was a general expectation of Christ's coming based on this same theory and the Septuagint chronology. The Pope himself preached the immediate coming of Christ. Gregory the Great declared the end at hand. But the theory was sand. How much more trustworthy is it 1200 years after the expiration of the 6000?

J. T. C.

WHAT IS THE CHRISTIAN'S HOPE?

Another case relied upon to prove that souls exist in consciousness after death, and separate from the body, is in 1 Kings xvii. 21, 22—"And he stretched himself upon the child three times, and cried unto the Lord, and said, O Lord, my God, I pray thee, let this child's soul come into him again! And the Lord heard the voice of Elijah; and the soul of the child came into him again and he revived."

Here, it is contended, it is clear that the soul is something distinct from the body, was out of the body, and came in again. Suppose we were to admit all that: that would not prove the soul was conscious out of the body; and there is nothing in the text or context to show that it was. The 17th verse shows what was out of the body—"His sickness was so sore, that there was no breath left in him." The same word translated soul is also translated breath—life. It was the child's breath that was out of him, and when it came into him again "he revived." In 1 Samuel xxx. 11, 12, we have a case where a man was found in a state of exhaustion, after having been fed, it is said "his spirit came again to him." What are we to understand by such an expression? The same, as, he revived. So the child's soul came into him again—his life his breath—came into him, and he revived. Nothing, then, can be made of this case to sustain the conscious state of the dead.

If the doctrine of an immediate entrance into conscious delight, at death, is taught in the Old Testament, why did men of God deprecate death? Let us note two or three examples. See the case of Hezekiah, Isa. xxxviii. 1–5—"In those days was Hezekiah sick unto death. And Isaiah the prophet, the son of Amos, came unto him and said, Thus saith the Lord, Set thine house in order; for thou shalt die and not live. Then Hezekiah turned his face toward the wall, and prayed unto the Lord, and said, Remember now, O Lord, I beseech thee, how I have walked before thee in truth, and with a perfect heart, and have done that which is good in thy sight: and Hezekiah wept sore. Then came the word of the Lord to Isaiah, saying, Go and say to Hezekiah, Thus saith the Lord, the God of David thy father, I have heard thy prayer, I have seen thy tears: behold I will add unto thy days fifteen years."

What does Hezekiah weep and pray for? Is he distressed at the prospect of so soon "going to heaven?" or, "to paradise?" Strange, truly, that he should be! Afraid of glory! But, perhaps he is afraid of going to the bad place. No, that cannot be; for, he pleads the fact that he had "walked before" God "in truth and with a perfect heart, and" of having "done that which is good in the sight" of God, as a reason for having his life prolonged. Strange procedure, truly, if he had arrived so near to heaven, and was assured he was now to go immediately to the company of angels and glorified spirits, that he should weep, mourn, and beg to stay longer in this wicked world! But, "fifteen years were added to his life, surely that was some gain," says the immortal-soul theorist. If he gained fifteen years on earth, he lost fifteen out of heaven! The immortal-soulist must think time on earth is better than time in heaven; or that earth is more desirable than heaven? But on the common theory, nothing was added to Hezekiah's life; nor, was it possible to add anything. All that was done was simply to transfer fifteen years from heaven to earth! A poor gain did he get for his prayers and tears. Such a gain as a man would get for changing a palace for a prison—or, health for sickness—or, peace and comfort for trouble and sorrow.

If he was actually to remain unconscious in death, then there is some meaning in saying fifteen years are added to thy life. The word of God, that communicated the mournful message to Hezekiah, of his death, was not equivocal; it was explicit; "Thou shalt die." Is that all? No. What else? "And not live." But modern theology says, "he would have lived in a higher and much better state!" Indeed! and he "wept sore" because he had heard such sad news!

After Hezekiah recovered, he praises God for his mercy. Mercy for what? If the common theorists are right, the mercy of being kept out of heaven fifteen years! Such theorists, one would suppose, think it a great hardship to go to heaven. Hezekiah, however, understood the matter in another light. He says: "Behold, for peace I had great bitterness; for thou hast in love to my soul [done what? kept it out of heaven! No, but] delivered it from the pit of corruption; for thou hast cast all my sins behind thy back. For the grave cannot praise; and death cannot celebrate thee; they that go down to the pit cannot hope for thy truth. The living, he shall praise thee as I do this day."

David is another example of the same kind. He says, Psa. vi. 5—"For in death there is no remembrance of thee: in the grave who shall give thee thanks?" Again, Psa. lxxxviii. 10–12—"Wilt thou show wonders to the dead? Shall the dead arise and praise thee? Shall thy loving kindness be declared in the grave? or thy faithfulness in destruction? Shall thy wonders be known in the dark? and thy righteousness in the land of forgetfulness?" And Psa. cxv. 37—"The dead praise not the Lord, neither any that go down into silence." The expressions show distinctly the writer's view of the state of the dead. Could he have said these things had he believed that "the dead know more than all the world," and enter into the presence of God?

Could he have said these things if he had believed the modern poetic effusions—

> I'll praise my maker with my breath,
> And when my voice is lost in death
> Praise shall employ my nobler powers," &c.

Such poetry contradicts the poetry of the Spirit of God, which declares—"The dead praise not the Lord." Thus "the sweet Psalmist of Israel" sung; but, modern songsters clash with it, and assert the contrary with a boldness that would defy David himself, if not David's Lord, by whose inspiration he spoke and sung.

Again David says Psa. xvii. 15—"As for me, I will behold thy face in righteousness: I shall be satisfied when I awake with thy likeness." When he should awake in his Lord's likeness, he would be satisfied—not before; hence he could not have believed that he should immediately enter into the presence of God; because he says, Psa. xvi. 11—"Thou wilt show me the path of life; in thy presence is fulness of joy; at thy right hand there are pleasures forevermore." Now, if Christians enter at death into the presence of God, in conscious enjoyment, then David is represented as looking to the Resurrection for satisfaction, and yet as declaring there was fulness of joy before; or in other words, he could be in the presence of God, where there is fulness of joy, and not be satisfied. But so far as David is concerned, Peter settles that point, Acts ii. 34; he says, "For David is not ascended into the heavens." But where is David? Peter says, Acts ii. 29, "The Patriarch David is both dead and buried." When he awakes, as he will, "at the last day," with all the saints, then he will "be satisfied."

THE HIDDEN STATE OF THE DEAD.

"Have the gates of death been opened unto thee? or hast thou seen the doors of the shadow of death?" Such is Jehovah's challenge to the patriarch Job, and which occurs among that wonderful series of questions by which the Almighty impressed his tried servant with the extreme narrowness and insignificance of human knowledge. The interrogation is equivalent to, "What knowest thou of death, or the dead?" And well had it been for mankind, and for the integrity and practical efficiency of Christianity, had they been content with the knowledge of their ignorance in this solemnly profound direction. We cannot explore the place of the dead—we know not even if there be a place, except in the imaginations of men, who because they know that all mankind share a common experience in this matter, speak of them as having gone to one place. It is the necessity of human thought which is compelled to localize the departed, that has originated a place, and a name for the place, of the dead. The Hebrews called it sheol, the Greeks hades, and the Saxons hell, words most aptly chosen, since while they subserve the necessity of human thought, they express at the same time the modesty of the human mind which in its election of terms, would, in this instance, appear to approve of the wisdom of not being wise above what is written.

The Greek word hades, is of very common occurrence in the Greek classics, but its classical signification is no criterion of its meaning in the sacred writings. We are referred back to the Hebrew sheol for the strict sense in which it is employed by the inspired writers.

"The Greek term did not come to the Hebrews from any classical source, or with any classical meaning, but through the Septuagint as a translation of their own word; and whether correctly translating it or not is a matter of critical opinion. The word hades is, therefore, in nowise binding upon us in any classical meaning which may be assigned to it. The real question, therefore is, what is the meaning which sheol bears in the Old Testament, and hades in the New? A careful examination of the passages in which these words occur will probably lead to the conclusion, that they afford no real sanction to the notion of an intermediate place of the kind indicated, but are used by the inspired writers to denote the grave—the resting place of the bodies, both of the righteous and the wicked."

Let it be borne in mind that nothing relative to the state of the dead can be ascertained by these words simply and separately considered. In all the three languages they have a common signification—their etymological meaning being the unseen, hidden, or unknown place or state. These terms, then, so far from conveying to us any information concerning the place or state of the dead, only express our own ignorance of these matters, and ought on this account to operate as a perpetual check upon the indiscretion of the rash speculator. Whatever sense the word sheol has in the Old Testament, hades, as its Greek equivalent, will have in the New. The Hebrew prophets, in their allusions to the place and state of the dead, conveyed their ideas in the imagery which was suggested by their mode of sepulture. It is not the Hebrew writings, but to the Greek philosophy, that we trace the birth of those opinions concering the state and place of the dead, which at the present time prevail as the orthodox creed of modern Christianity. Such opinions must necessarily be defective, and destitute of any claim on our religious belief, since they partake of the imperfection and uncertainty which characterize all human investigation. They are philosophical traditions, not scriptural informations, and as such ought to be jealously excluded from the sacred domain of inspired authority.

It is evident that the Hebrew prophets were strangers to these philosophical opinions—their poetical descriptions of death, and the dead, show whence their imagery was derived, and suggest that they could form no other conceptions of the condition of the departed, than what the analogies of their mode of interment presented to their view. Bp. Lowth, in his "Lectures on Hebrew Poetry," says, "That which struck their senses they delineated in their descriptions: we there find no exact account, no explicit mention of immortal spirits." A very significant testimony! This testimony is the more important since the Bishop considered that the immortality of the soul as a disembodied existence, was a doctrine known to and acknowledged by the prophets; and he accounts for their unform silence on this subject, "because they had no clear idea or perception by which they might explain where or in what manner it existed; and they were not possessed of that subtlety of language which enables men to speak with plausibility on subjects abstruse and remote from the apprehension of the senses, and to cover their ignorance with learned disputation. The condition, the form, the habitation of departed spirits were, therefore, concealed from the Hebrews equally with the rest of mankind. Nor did revelation afford the smallest assistance on this subject."

I would beg the reader's special attention to this paragraph from the pen of the learned Bishop. He acknowledges that the writings of the prophets contain no explicit mention of immortal spirits—that they never alluded to disembodied spiritual existence, and that revelation did not afford them the smallest assistance on this subject. Is his inference then a reasonable one, that the prophets who make no mention of immortal spirits, therefore believed in immortal spirits? and that, although they make no allusion to disembodied spiritual existence, that is to be explained by their inability to express suitably their ideas? And that, notwithstanding revelation afforded not the smallest assistance on this subject, the soul's disembodied existence, as the human personality, and the intermediate state as popularly understood and held, were yet doctrines of revelation?

By what unknown process could the Bishop arrive at such conclusions? The sacred writers have said nothing about these doctrines, therefore, says Bp. Lowth, they believed them! I humbly suggest that this negative premises would be more logically connected with a negative inference; that since the sacred writers have said nothing about these doctrines, the probability is that they knew nothing about them. Their word sheol drew a veil over the departed state, and involved it in concealment and darkness. If ever they have occasion to refer to to the departed, their thoughts are not directed upwards, as if they believed that the personality as a disembodied soul had ascended to God—they think of the body and the tomb, and associate the departed with that which is buried.

Thus, "they shall go down to the bars of the pit, when our rest together is in the dust." Job xvii. 16. "Let not the pit shut her mouth upon me." Ps. lxix. 15. "My life draweth nigh unto the grave. I am counted with them that go down into the pit. Free among the dead, like the slain that lie in the grave, whom thou rememberest no more: and they are cut off from thy hand. Thou hast laid me in the lowest pit, in darkness, in the deeps." Ps. lxxxviii. 3–6. "Therefore, sheol hath enlarged herself, and opened her mouth without measure, and their glory, and their multitude, and their pomp, and he that rejoiceth shall descend into it." Is. v. 14. "When I shall bring thee down with them that descend into the pit, with the people of old time, and shall set thee in the low parts of the earth, in places desolate of old, with them that go down to the pit, that thou be not inhabited." Ezek. xxvi. 20.

It seems sufficiently plain that the prophets associate the personality of the departed with the buried body; and since the words which they utter are not always their own, but they are frequently the message bearers of Jehovah, as in the citation last given, it seems also plain that God himself points to the grave as the temporary abode of the human personality: "Dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return." Gen. iii. 19. P. H.

A Voice From the West.

BY J. LEWIS, OTTO, ILL.

Dear Brethren and Sisters, in our common Lord, and lovers of the whole truth of the blessed Bible, the word of God:—Permit me to say that my heart was glad and my whole soul rejoiced at the coming of our much beloved Brother and faithful laborer W. S. Campbell. Truly, it was like the coming of Titus; and now that he is with us in our work of labor and love, in this vast field, let me say for your encouragement, that we have got fairly in the work, with a full set of gospel harness on, that fits most admirably, so that we have hitched to the gospel plough, and the first effort that we made was at Summum, where things went off well: so much so that we have good reason to think we have got a complete victory over the Sectarian dogma of immortal soulism, dying and going to heaven, if good; if bad, to a hell of fire, and thousands of years after brought back to be tried, by a sort of court marshall, to see whether they ought to have been sent there. All this proceeds from the groundless notion of the immortality of the soul.

But there is another sectarian dogma that is more inconsistent, if possible, than the above, that is, the resurrection of the wicked dead to a life of consciousness, just simply for the purpose of inflicting pain upon them, to kill them over again, and call it the second death, when God says, "Affliction shall not rise up the second time." Deliver us from charging our God with such folly.

But to return. Brother Campbell is just the man that we have long prayed for; and the only difficulty in the way is, that we can't draw on an even whiffletree. I have to have the advantage. But we make a full team for all that; so that the work goes off first rate. Praise the Lord for the prospect of doing much good in Old Fulton Co., we trust you will never regret that you contributed to the Western missionary fund. May the Lord reward you with eternal life, and put it in the hearts of others to bestow liberally; so that Br. Campbell may be sustained and his family made comfortable in his absence. We intend to do all we can to help him whilst he is with us. I hope the Brethren in Ills., when they see this, will feel it a duty to give something; and if they want our labors in the Southern part of the State, say Bunker Hill, Lebanon, and elsewhere, we should be glad if they would write to us at Otto, Fulton Co., Ill. Br. Campbell is a workman, understanding the gospel plan of salvation, of no life out of Christ, most perfectly. But it is not worth while to say more at present; the truth is, what we do, must be done quickly; the Lord is coming. Amen. We want more Tracts and, also, above all, that you should pray for us.

Mode of Reproof.

Some persons pride themselves upon being blunt, or, as they call it, "honest;" but such very blunt people do little good to others, and get little love to themselves. The scriptures recommend gentleness and kindness. Reproof should fall like the gentle dew, and not like the rushing hailstorm. The oil insinuateth itself: the stone wounds and then rebounds. (Ps. cxli., 5.) Christians should take heed of getting fond of the work of "rebuking." Such "spiritual constables" do a great deal of mischief without intending it. They are in a church what a very witty and sarcastic person is in society, or what a telltale is in school; and approximate very closely to that class which the apostle terms "Busy-bodies in other men's matters."

Our manner must be tender and winning. The nail of reproof, says an old writer, must be well oiled in kindness before it is driven home. Meddling with the faults of others is like attempting to move a person afflicted with the rheumatic gout—it must be done slowly and tenderly, nor must we be frightened by an outcry or two. The great thing is to show the person that you really love him; and if you manifest this in the sight of God, he will bless your efforts, and give you favor in the sight of an erring brother.—Christian Treasury.

NO IMMORTALITY NOR FUTURE LIFE, EXCEPT IN JESUS CHRIST ALONE, AND BY A RESURRECTION AT THE LAST DAY IF DEAD, OR A CHANGE IF ALIVE.

OUR PAPER, is issued this week, so as to give our office force the 4th inst. for rest, on this anniversary of our national birth day.

Western Mission.—No. 3.

FROM W. S. CAMPBELL.

Br. Lewis, the "one armed man," has an influence in this county that is healthy, and telling on the spread of our views; but he works by gradually seeding the lot, and in due time, bringing home the sheaves. It is by continually effecting a little that he effects great results in the end. It is "allowed" that he is master of the great bible doctrine of Life, and none of the enemies of the true doctrine of Immortality are willing to measure weapons with him. But, at the same time, it is astonishing to consider the amount of prejudice which prevails upon the question of life for the future world.

There are brethren scattered about who are glad to hear and who hail the old man as an apostle; and, again, there are those who oppose; and yet there is a general desire to hear in different parts of the county. I should think that at Lewistown the best opening is presented. We can occupy the Court House, at any time; and we expect to hold our field meeting upon the Fair grounds. It is a place of some consequence, having three or four thousand inhabitants. It is accessible by rail road, and a more proper point of contact with the friends in the county than Havana, which is in Mason Co., and on the east bank of the Illinois river.

I find that the prospect of success in this Mission depends upon labor distributed over the whole county in small places; and it will require constant work. I shall be compelled to follow the lead of the pioneer, and hope in the next to report some progress.

I think that the love of the doctrine of "No Life out of Christ," only, would induce me to leave the East, even for a few weeks to labor in this peculiar field. Some of our brethren who could not adapt themselves to the Western style of life would find themselves quite discomfited in the attempt to preach among these dwellers upon the prairies.

I have been somewhat accustomed to this mode in days past; but it takes a short time to get wonted to the new mode of personal accommodation and ministerial operation. I have to "rough" it, and come right to the level by which the people can be brought to the faith of the word. My coat comes off literally, and in the sense which you intimated. The greatest personal inconvenience is the absence of good water. Pray that we may have a shower of divine influence.

Yesterday, the meeting at Summum came off well. We began on Friday evening under very unfavorable circumstances indeed; and on Saturday evening after one of the most terribly hot days ever experienced in this climate, there came over prairie and timber a terrific storm of wind, thunder and rain, such as eastern men must see to understand, which caused us to close in the midst of the service, when Br. Lewis and myself walked back to Br. Hughes two miles to where we had taken tea, by the light of heaven's own fireworks, (the lightning, glaring out on the blackness of darkness, gave a vivid and awful view of our path over slough and quag)—till we reached the wood; when, by the transition from one element to the other, alternately, we saw every imaginable form blazing and dancing about, and found most hospitable entertainment under the roof of one who loves the truth and loves the Herald of Life. We slept soundly, through the care of our heavenly Father, being abundantly thankful that he gave us light in the gloom of the tempest.

Sunday was a beautiful day. We had a good congregaton. All things went well. There was much conviction on the minds of the people. We gave tracts and papers their part of the work, and they are doing it. Now we are full of courage. Men begin to inquire after the doctrines which they have considered strange. Pray that the Lord may open the door and give access to the "regions beyond." Summum is one of the hardest places we expect to find in this county; but prejudice is giving way and sectarian feeling caving in.

We hope some real good will be the result of these efforts: at all events, we are determined to cast in the seed. We trust in the Lord, that in the harvest hour some wheat will be winnowed for the garner. We cannot tell "which shall prosper this or that," but must improve the morning.

As we came walking back to Otto, some five or six miles, through the openings, I tried to keep up with "the old man," or to keep him back (he is powerful at walking and does a heap of it) for I was foot-sore and lame;—we fell into a sort of apostolic joy that we were counted worthy to go into the vineyard, and preach the great beauties of the plan of salvation.

Is the truth of great value to us? Do we, who feel called to labor in the work, apprehend the fulness of the blessing we have received? What of the sacrifice required? Would some of our delicate men like to take hold of the plough? To-morrow we start our locomotive for an appointment away up in a back settlement.

Eternal Torment.

"Good morning, Br. Easy, I am glad to meet you this morning. I have had reason to change my opinion on the subject of future punishment since I saw you last."

"Changed your opinion? is it possible? have you, then, left the church of your fathers, the church in which you were born, and gone into infidelity?"

"No, Br. Easy, I have not gone into infidelity. I now love God better, I hope, than I ever did before. And this arises from the fact that I now see God in a different light. I now see God as a being of love and mercy."

"What! did you not see God in this light before?"

"No, Br. Easy, I did not. I was told that God was merciful, but could not see any mercy in tormenting a poor child of earth to all eternity, just for one sin."

"So you deny future punishment entirely, and have turned Universalist, have you?"

"No, I have not turned Universalist, and I believe in future punishment, but not in eternal torment."

"What on earth, then, is the wages of sin, if it is not misery, torment, if you please, to all eternity?" As long as the righteous enjoy, the wicked will have to suffer."

"Then, Br. Easy, you do not believe what Br. Paul has written. He says 'the wages of sin is death.'"

"Oh! yes, I believe that; it is one of our strong proof texts. Yes, they will die the death that never dies. That is their punishment."

"You say, Br. Easy, that the wicked will receive, as their reward, the death that never dies. Could not I say, with equal propriety, that the righteous will receive as their reward a life that never lives? but you see the absurdity involved here. Let me ask you three or four questions. You believe that death, as the punishment of sin, means torment, anguish, misery, in a lake of fire and brimstone, to all eternity, do you?"

"Yes, that is their just reward."

"And you believe without a Saviour the whole human family would suffer thus?"

"Yes, that would have been their condition."

"You believe, however, that 'Christ died for our sins, according to the Scriptures?'"

"Oh! yes. Without him there would be no hope."

"Well, Br. Easy, if Christ suffered for us as a sacrifice, he must have suffered the same in kind and degree as we would have to suffer, if he had not suffered for us."

"Yes, he bore our sins in his body, on the tree. By his stripes we are healed. And he poured out his soul a sacrifice for our sins, and in our stead and for us."

"Whatever, then, was the penalty for man's sins, Christ, suffering for them and in their stead, must have suffered?"

"Yes, certainly.

"And you say the penalty is eternal torment in hell-fire?"

"The Bible says so, and that they remain in this state to all eternity."

"Then, Br. Easy, Christ has not 'ascended;' has not 'sat down at the right hand of the Majesty in the heavens;' has not become an 'High Priest after the order of Melchisedec;' and has not yet obtained 'eternal redemption for us;' has not"—

"Stop! stop! What do you mean to talk thus?"

"I mean, Br. Easy, to tell you the plain, simple truth. You say the wages of sin is death, and this death is anguish, suffering, torment, in a lake of fire and brimstone, to all eternity. You say that Christ has 'died for our sins, according to the Scriptures,' and that Christ suffered the same in kind and degree that man would have to suffer if he had no Saviour. Now you see plainly, if torment is the wages of sin, and Christ bore the penalty, then he is now in this state of torment, and will be to all eternity. And if this is the case we need not look 'for the Saviour from heaven,' for he is not there, but in hell. We need not expect to 'see him as he is,' unless we would consent to visit those fiery regions. We would not consent even to have our vile bodies changed, and made like his glorious body, for his would be full of pain and fiery anguish and all the blessings to be realized at Christ's coming would be snatched from us forever, if your view is correct."

(Easy, after a pause) "I never thought of the subject in that light before."

"Thousands of honest souls are in your condition, Br. Easy; they have never thought of the subject in the light of the gospel. Oh! what a character do they give to our heavenly Father; they make of him (whose nature is love) a fiend; they forget that God has said that he is not willing that any should perish, but that all should come to him and live."

When we see this subject in its true light, all appears beautiful. God advised man to follow in a certain given way, tells him that blessings, and honor, and life will be given him if he follows his directions, but warns him not to act contrary to his advice, and tells him the certain consequence, which would be death, a returning back to his former atoms, "for dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return."

Man sins, but God loved the world to such an extent, that he gave his only Son to die for them. Yes, to suffer in their stead, "the just for the unjust." For whatever was the penalty of this broken law, that Christ suffered. If it is banishment from God's presence, then Christ was banished. If it was torment in hell, for a period of time, finally to be restored, then Christ has suffered this and has been restored. If it is death, a cessation of life, then he has died and risen again; but if the penalty is eternal torment, then our blessed Lord is suffering this to-day, and will to all eternity.

Yours in hope of eternal life,
GEORGE W. HURD.

Iona, Illinois.

REMARKS ON THE ABOVE.

1. The foregoing article by Eld Hurd is from the Voice of the West, and in that paper it follows Br. Seymour's effort to prove that the wicked will live again.

2. I take it that Br. Hurd believes in the resurrection of the wicked, in their being tormented for a time, in their dying the second time, and in their remaining dead eternally. This I understand to be his idea of the divine penalty. If it is what he believes, how could he, when he penned his dialogue, have failed to see that "Br. Easy" might easily overwhelm him with his own logic. "You, sir!"—"Br. Easy" might have responded—"do not carry out your own logic, for you do not believe that after Christ rose from death he was tormented for a period and then consigned to the domain of death the second time, to remain there forever."

3. But I see that I am not sufficiently careful in representing Br. Hurd's real position. It is not, it will be observed, that Christ endured that penalty "in kind and degree" to which the sinner is now exposed, but that Christ suffered that which we would have to suffer, if he [Christ] had not suffered for us. Now we understand you, Br. Hurd; but your cause is not thereby helped in the least. As an Adventist, you hold—what, in 1 Cor. xv. 18, Paul clearly teaches—that the precise doom of the race, "in kind and degree," if Christ had not "died for our sins," would be to perish, by dying and never having a resurrection. Now our Saviour did not perish, but rose from the dead to die no more forever. The theory, therefore, that Christ endured the penalty that attaches to the divine law, with or without the atonement, is without foundation. More than all this, the Bible nowhere teaches that Christ paid the penalty due to sin. That penalty is to be held in death's grasp to all eternity, and it falls only on the impenitent. R. W.

Where is Hell?

BY ELD. WILLARD GRIFFIN.

The question was asked a Methodist brother a few Sundays ago, and he answered, "In your own bosom." That is an idea that many entertain who discard the notion of a literal hell of fire and brimstone; but most people profess to believe in a real place of torment. Our ideas of hell were derived from the Greeks and Romans. They supposed the earth to be a vast plain, beneath which was an extensive region which constituted the prison house or penal establishment of departed spirits. Above the earth was another region called heaven; separated from the earth by a firmament, or platform, called the sky. But modern science has thrown the ancient cosmography into such confusion that although people have some vague notions of such places as heaven and hell, yet they find it impossible to locate them. Professor Whiston was so bothered to determine the location of hell that he had to fix it on one ofthe comets, where in one part of its orbit the poor damned culprits would be subjected to the most intense cold, and in the other the heat would be greater than that of red hot iron.

I sometimes find it interesting to review the orthodox sentiments that have prevailed in my own day. I once heard a minister say that not more than one out of sixty would be saved, and that all others, including the whole heathen world, must endure the torments of hell forever. A minister in Massachusetts was called to attend the funeral of a young lady who had died unconverted. In his sermon he stated that as she had died impenitent, she must have been one of the reprobates, and consequently could never have been converted, and it was better for her to die young, for if she had lived to be old she would only have treasured up wrath against the day of wrath, and her punishment would have been much greater.

An old man, a member of the Baptist church, had a son killed by lightning. At the funeral, in answer to a question asked by some sympathizing neighbor, he said, he believed his son was in a miserable eternity. A pious old Presbyterian lost an amiable and beloved daughter. He was questioned with regard to her moral condition, and replied, that as she died without a hope he must believe that she was roasting in the flames of hell. As if a pure spirit, of such extreme tenuity that we have no means of ascertaining its existence, could undergo a process of that kind. No immortal spirit could suffer from literal fire. No imperishable body of however delicate or complicated an organization could be subject to pain or suffering; for pain always indicates the commencement of a process of destruction; which, if not counteracted by some recuperative process, would terminate in dissolution.

The theory that hell is the sting of conscience is not very reasonable, unless we suppose that souls undergo a great change in their moral condition in passing into another state of existence; for, in this world, the most wicked persons are not troubled with compunctions of conscience. The most hardened in wickedness can often sleep the soundest. They will exult in the success of their wicked devices, and look back with pleasure upon the scenes of their sinful indulgences, while many christians have such tender consciences that they make themselves miserable by their self-accusations.

It is unfortunate that our translators of the Bible could not have found more than one English word to correspond with the original Hebrew word sheol, and the three Greek words, Gehenna, Hades, and Tartarus. The word hell corresponds to sheol of the Old Testament and Hades of the New; but neither of them signified primarily a place of punishment. In reference to individuals they mean the grave, or state of the dead. Applied to cities, they mean destruction, famine, pestilence, or some overwhelming disaster. Applied to nations they signify captivity, destruction, or some great national calamity. Gehenna, literally the land of Hinnom, which has often been described, is used figuratively for punishment, suffering, and various calamities, either personal, civic, or national. The word Tartarus is used but once in the New Testament; and then signifies the prison of the fallen angels. What, or where it was, I do not know. Theology has become so complicated and mystified that many persons after much study and investigation have given up in despair, and declared that they did not know what to believe. Pilate, when conversing with Jesus, asked, What is truth? and the question has been sked thousands of times. But as Christ is the way, the truth, and the life; and the Spirit of truth will guide us into all truth; so, in order to arrive at truth, we must follow their teachings. With regard to interpretations of scripture we must adopt those which appear to us most reasonable.

Questions Answered.

Will Bro. Curry please answer a few questions through the Herald of Life, and oblige one seeking for light.

1. Is man the only "creature" intended in Rom. viii. 21?

2. With whom is "creature" embraced, compared, and contrasted, in the latter part of the verse?

3. What is considered in connection and contrast with "ourselves" in the 23d verse?

4. Is the word "also" necessary to give the Apostle's meaning in the verses alluded to? If so why does Bro. Curry omit it in quotation? (See response to E. B. Louden, Herald of Life, June 14, 1865).

Preble, N. Y. R. CADWELL.

RESPONSE.—We number our answers to correspond with the questions.

1. We believe that he is.

2. With "the children of God."

3. "The whole creation," or, as the margin has it, "every creature." The original Greek is pasa hee ktisis, and is found elsewhere in the N. T. but twice—Mark xvi. 15, Col. i. 23; where it necessarily applies to man only.

4. The Apostle's meaning is the same, with or without the word "also." Its presence in the text gives emphasis to the contrast between "the creature" and "ourselves." We did not "quote" the text in the case referred to; if we had, we should have used "also." The reason we used some of the language is that we regarded it as a very clear declaration that Adam was created mortal, subject to death by the Almighty, not only for himself alone, but also for his posterity. It is true that the Apostle's argument requires him to make a distinction between the great mass of mankind and those of whom he had been speaking—the children of God through the Spirit. Yet these very children of God did by nature belong to the whole creation that was subjected to vanity in the loins of their common parent.

To get the Apostle's meaning we must consider the previous context, "The Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God: and if children, then heirs; heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ; if so be that we suffer with him, that we may be also glorified together. For I reckon that the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory which shall be revealed in us." To be heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ is to participate in the Millennial throne, to be "a kingdom, priests unto God." It is to "reign over the earth." It is to be made like Christ in body—incorruptible, glorious, powerful, spiritual, heavenly, immortal; for "flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God." This high honor is only attained by suffering. "If so be that we suffer with him, that we may be also glorified with him." "If we suffer, we shall also reign with him." "We must through much tribulation enter into the kingdom of God." On these latter words, Adam Clarke well remarks: "As the spirit of the world would be ever opposed to the Spirit of Christ, so they must make up their minds to expect persecution and tribulation in various forms; and therefore had need of confirmed souls and strong faith, that when trials came, they might meet them with becoming fortitude; and stand unmoved in the dark and cloudy day. And as the mind must faint under trouble, that sees no prospect of its termination, and no conviction of its use; it was necessary that they should keep in view the kingdom of God, of which they were subjects; and to which through their adoption into the heavenly family, they had a divine right........They should meet with much tribulation; yet these were the very means which God would use to bring them into his kingdom."

Dr. Clarke had not the light of the present day, or he would have seen the impropriety of saying "they were subjects" to the kingdom; the Apostle declares them to be heirs.—"Through their adoption they had a divine right" to the throne. But his language concerning the tribulation is to the point. It is about time that people were instructed that the kingdom is not a free gift. We may see how a person may get future and eternal life, and yet fail of obtaining the kingdom. That is only for those who overcome, and the word "overcome" means something. It indicates a development of positive character. Mere conversion from a state of sin, mere personal acceptance with God, mere negative goodness, do not answer to this rugged word. Meek listlessness, lamb-like indifference, easy-going piety do not get the kingdom. "The kingdom of heaven is gotten by force, and the forcible seize it." Matt. xi. 12. Those who "overcome" must needs "suffer." But they do not suffer for nothing. "The sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory which shall be revealed in us."

The Apostle now turns his attention to those who are to be the subjects of the kingdom. He knew that the great plan of redemption is not for the few, but for the many; that the complete unfolding of God's purposes toward mankind is reserved to the future age. Christ on the throne of David will be the guarantee of mercy to "the whole creation," for "in mercy shall the throne be established." In view of this coming blessing to "all the families of the earth," the Apostle uses a beautiful figure. He represents the whole creation as waiting for this grand consummation. "The earnest expectation of the creature waiteth for the manifestation of the sons of God. This parallels the prophet's word—"The desire of all nations shall come." All nations, all the families of the earth, the creature, the whole creation, are interchangeable expressions.

Paul now proceeds to unfold God's original design toward mankind. "The creature was subjected to vanity, not willingly [not that this state of corruption is the fault of Adam, as many mistakenly affirm], but by reason of Him who hath subjected it in hope." God created man of the earth, earthy. Man found himself weak, dying, and even sinful But after the trial in the garden had brought these facts to his reflection, the Creator held out a "hope." The seed of the woman shall crush the serpent's head. And Paul shows what is involved here. "Because [not only we who have become heirs of God and joint heirs with Christ are to be blessed, but] the creature itself also [the race of man shall be delivered [ultimately] from the bondage of corruption into the liberty of the glory of the children of God." That which we attain at Christ's coming is to be given thereafter to a great multitude that no man can number. All who are brought into the communion of saints in the future age from among all the nations, and "the rest of the dead" (but not the wicked dead) who are raised at the end of that age will then be immortalized. This is "the mystery of His will, according to his good pleasure which he hath purposed in himself; that in the dispensation of the fulness of times, He might gather together in one all things in Christ, both which are in the heavens ["they that are Christ's at his coming"], and which are on earth." Eph. i. 9, 10.

And this immortalization of the saved race of man is a thing to be desired. "For we know that the whole creation groaneth and travaileth together in pain until now. And not only they, but ourselves also, who have the first fruits of the Spirit, even we ourselves groan within ourselves, waiting for the adoption, the redemption of our body." Here are two groaning classes. One class has the advantage in that they have the "first fruits of the Spirit;" but the other class will have the harvest of the Spirit. One class are "a kind of first fruits of his creatures;" they are "the church of the first born;" they are "first fruits unto God and the Lamb:" but the other class are the great harvest of the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world. Positively Something New.

The doctrine of Life in the future for the righteous alone is quite out of its place when "under a bushel." It should neither be hid nor be kept in the back ground. Its true position is "on a candlestick," that it may give "light unto all that are in the house." If not presented apart from its doctrinal relations and practical bearings, it cannot be made too prominent. And much of heavenly wisdom is needed that the recipients of this divine treasure may not waste any of their energies in their efforts to secure its acceptance by others. These efforts are in the right spirit only when they are put forth to glorify God and bless our fellow men. Our work should have no place for "strife or vainglory." To convince is far better than merely to confound in argument; and this ability to convince is not always the accompaniment of logical acuteness. How to attain it in the fullest measure compatible with our intellectual strength and resources in knowledge, is worthy of our most careful study.

As regards the view of no life out of Christ, one principal work of its advocates manifestly is, to fairly remove the principal difficulties that in so many minds stand in the way of receiving the doctrine. And this we must consent to do again and again. As a general rule these difficulties are honestly held to be valid objections to our Life view. To call them frivolous would bring no relief to the seeker after truth, nor would such an one be helped by the assurance that his objections had been often answered before. Our business is to render him the help he needs, and to do it patiently and with a proper appreciation of the fact, that some things once appeared very dark and difficult to us that we now regard as quite easy of comprehension and belief.

Thoughts like the foregoing came into our mind as we took up our pen to speak of a new argument in behalf of a reliving of the wicked dead. It comes to us in the last number of th Voice of the West, in an article entitled "The Wicked Raised to Life?" The writer is Bro. A. N. Seymour, an estimable and laborious Advent minister residing in Michigan. He was once our guest over Sabbath when we lived in Albany, and the feelings with which we remember him are of the most fraternal kind. At the time our brother sojourned with us for a day we thought him not a little favorable to the view we hold relative to the wicked dead. But he now seems to regard it as "unsupported by any evidence found in the Word of Life, and fraught with deleterious influences." What might give this opinion of Bro. S. weight with some minds is the fact that he claims that he has "given a somewhat critical attention to this question for years past." Well, we are glad he has done this; for the question merits that kind of attention. We are likewise glad that Br. S. has attempted through the Voice to justify the conclusions to which his researches have led him. We HERALD OF LIFE people welcome agitation on this subject, and we accept it as evidence that "among us, as a people," more than Br. Seymour's "some few have adopted the non-living of wicked dead men." (The italics are ours.)

We now propose to lay before our readers the only new argument we find in our brother's Voice article. They will see that his "somewhat critical attention" to the non-resurrection theory has in a measure taken him out of the argumentative groove in which most of his co-laborer's run by common consent. He ventures to make as strong a demand on John vi. for proof, as they habitually do on verses 28 and 29 of the previous chapter! Hitherto we have supposed that our opponents regarded the sixth chapter of John as forbidden ground, so far as respects any appeal to it in support of the revival of dead sinners. Yea, more, we have believed that said chapter was deemed by many of them as difficult to harmonize with the view that those who refuse the "bread which came down from heaven" will be made alive by Jesus Christ. But Br. Seymour approaches the chapter in question with his optics sharpened by a declaration found in the second Psalm, and, thus armed, he feels certain that he has found the wicked in the thirty-ninth verse. He writes as follows:—

"Corresponding testimony found in John vi. 39, proves equally conclusively that wicked dead men will be raised: 'And this is the Father's will which hath sent me, that of all which he hath given me I should lose nothing, but should raise it up at the last day.' What hath God given to Christ? 'Ask of me and I will give thee the heathen for thine inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession.' (Ps. ii. 8.) Here the heathen, or Gentile nations, including their judges and kings, are embraced in the gift of God, and it is his will that they should be raised in the last day, and if unregenerated, dashed to pieces like a potter's vessel by the stone cut out of the mountain without hands.

"After Jesus states that all are to be raised that the Father hath given him in the last day, as proven in John v. 28, 29, he proceeds to specify three times a special class and the reward connected therewith. 'And this is the will of him that sent me, that every one that seeth the Son and believeth on him may have everlasting life, and I will raise him up at the last day.' Death will never have dominion over this class that are raised to everlasting life," etc.

Asking the EDITOR of our paper to send a copy of the number containing this article to the address of Br. Seymour, we respectfully invite the latter's attention to some strictures upon his argument given above. And we shall take the liberty in what follows to use the form of personal address. A like privilege is hereby accorded to Br. S., in case he wishes to reply in these columns.

1. It is worthy of your most most "critical attention" that, in John vi. 39, the verbs "should lose" and "raise up again" (in Greek apollumi and anesteemi) stand in direct contrast. From this it follows that the loss referred to in the passage means remaining in death. Am I right on these two points?

2. If I have correctly construed the verb "should lose," the Saviour must be understood as teaching that those whom he raises "at the last day" will live forever. Do you not see that, if the wicked are to die after being raised, they will be just as completely lost as they would have been had they remained dead without a resurrection?

3. The Saviour in John iii. 15, 16 teaches that unbelievers will perish. Now the word rendered perish in those two verses is the very word that in John vi. 39, describes a fate which you say awaits nobody! How is this?

4. You are prodigiously mistaken in your assumption, that the phrase "all which he hath given me," in John vi. 39, includes the impenitent. Let me state the argument and show you that the wicked must be left out of it:—

Those whose resurection is affirmed in John vi. 39 are "all which" the Father "hath given" to Christ.

But those, whom, according to the discourse in John vi., the Father hath given to Christ, are exclusively the righteous.

Therefore, those whose resurrection is affirmed in John vi. 39 are exclusively the righteous.

The validity of this argument you will I doubt not at once admit: I mean that you will concede that the premises fairly imply the conclusion. Your article assents to the major premise. It only remains, therefore, to show that the minor proposition is true. This is easily done. Verse 37 declares, "All that the Father giveth me shall come to me." Hence it follows that all who are embraced in the word "it" in verse 39 come to Christ. The only remaining question, then, is this, Who are they that come to Christ? Two statements of our Lord shall answer this inquiry: 1. "He that cometh to me shall never hunger." (ver. 35.) Does Br. Seymour doubt that this means none but the righteous? I am sure he cannot doubt it. 2. "Him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out." (ver. 37.) Again I ask, does my brother find the wicked described here? He surely does not find them, and because he does not, his interpretation of John vi. 39 must be given up. He may feel assured that those whom the Life-giver "will in no wise cast out" have nothing to fear from "the stone cut out of the mountain without hands." Those whom the Son of God will "dash in pieces like a potter's vessel" are not a class that "come" to Christ. But those whom Christ will raise up at the last day do "come" to him. What they come to him for, is everlasting life. To confer this priceless boon he must raise them from the dead. But it by no means follows from this, that he must also raise up those to whom he says (John v. 40)—"Ye will not come unto me that ye might have life."

In conclusion, I would invite Br. Seymour to make some response to the foregoing. If he will do so, it will encourage an effort to correct his misapprehension of other passages touched upon in his article. Let him give us the full benefit of the "critical attention" he has bestowed on the question of no future life for the wicked. If he has light we want it; if he is in error, we shall be glad to see that he is not afraid of a thorough sifting of his opinions and interpretations.

"Hopeless Misery."

Eld. O. R Fassett, of Sandy Hill, N. Y., has an article on "Revelation xx chapter" in the last Voice of the West. In speaking of "the epoch for the fulfilment of this prophetic portion of God's Word," he has the following concluding remark:—

"Hence it must be at doomsday—the day of final judgment; the great day when all men are to be consigned either to endless happiness or hopeless misery, and 'the second death."

We do not propose to argue just now against our esteemed brother's "hopeless misery" notion. Br. F., though holding to the extinction of the wicked. belongs to the Advent Herald's "Board of Contributors," and we can readily imagine that Dr. Litch would welcome to his columns such an assertion of "hopeless misery" for the wicked. But the Editor of the Voice, since his espousal of the non-immortality of the wicked, has said, "It is time we were emancipated from those views of God and His word that only fill us with agony, and embrace those that are in harmony with God's parental character, as well as his word;" and we do not see how he can relish Br. Fassett's style of remark. If "hopeless misery" is in "harmony with God's parental character," an orthodox theologian may well refuse to see in endless "misery" anything that should "only fill us with agony." Another thought comes in here in reference to Eld. F's utterance in the Voice. If our recollection is correct, it was Eld. F. who first led Eld. Himes to doubt the truth of endless torment; so Eld. H. has represented the matter in his paper. We suggest that he now set about the work of convincing Eld. Fassett that "hopeless misery" for sinners is not taught in the Bible.

One other thought still. Eld. Fassett believes that the thing which brings "hopeless misery" upon the wicked is "the free gift of the justification of life" mentioned in the fifth of Romans! So he teaches if we collate with his Voice article one that he published last fall in the Crisis on "Redemption." In an article week before last, we said to the advocates of the revival of the wicked: "If you believe that the resurrection will be to them in any conceivable [the types made us say "considerable"] sense an advantage, assert that belief, and then tell us wherein the advantage will consist." And we went on to apply the remark to the claim set up by our opponents in regard to "the justification of life." We would now like to ask Br. Fassett how that "justification" can be to the sinner a "free GIFT" and at the same time a curse bringing "hopeless misery," while to the saint it brings naught but blessing. To make "Hopeless misery" an out growth of "the redemption in Jesus Christ," as he and others do, is an outrage upon language, or we have yet to learn the first rudiments of the meaning of terms and of the scheme of salvation.

From Leonard C. Thorne.

GRANVILLE, N. Y., June 21, 1865.

BR. STORRS:—Although I have not seen you, or been favored to hear from you, direct, since you left New York for the East, I see by the paper you are again at home discharging the duties pertaining to the office. Knowing you had much and long desired to visit your, then surviving, brother in New Hampshire, it afforded me no little gratification to learn, as I did through the columns of the Herald, that you took occasion while east to do so. A source of very much comfort and joy must be the reflection that you were with him during some of his last hours and saw in him the evidence of a growth in grace, by which you now know that he sleeps in Jesus and will come forth to glory when the Lord shall make up his jewels.

A month since, during your absence, I left the City and came here hoping to receive, at least, as much benefit from the fine, fresh mountain air as I received last year, but it was almost too late. My condition was worse than I supposed, and sometimes, since coming here, life seemed suspended by a frail thread. Through the mercy and goodness of God, however, I am gaining strength, and my hope is that the improvement may be permanent. Such are the trials to which we are wisely subjected that we cannot know when ill may befall us. To-day we are flushed with the strength and vigor of manhood; to-morrow we are withered like the forest leaf, or cut down like the flower of the field. We are laid away into the silent chambers of death, there to mingle with the cold clods of the valley, and be numbered with the silent dead. We are being continually reminded that sickness, sorrow, and death, are inseparable to this state, and until the last enemy is destroyed, and mortality swallowed up of life, the yawning grave will await its victim and death remain the acknowledged conqueror.

But notwithstanding this is the inevitable doom of all, if the Lord come not soon, "sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof," and while we keep our lamps trimmed always and burning, while with the help of God, we are ever ready, ever prepared, and need not further anticipate the evil day. O how blessed is the assurance that if, while our hope is deferred, death shall have claimed dominion over us we have dwelling in us the Spirit of him who raised up Jesus from the dead, and because we have that Spirit dwelling in us we too shall come forth triumphant over death and sing the victor's song. Then, too, we have that abiding faith by which we are enabled to look down into the otherwise dark and uncertain future, seeing events both glorious and terrible, that are shortly coming to pass, and comprehend them with a degree of certainty that amounts almost to absoluteness. We see our blessed Master, once the humble, now the exalted; once dishonored, now glorified, coming in the majesty of power. The clouds are his chariot and angels are his escort. He speaks the mighty word of power and those dear saints who then sleep in Jesus come forth clothed with immortal youth; while those who are alive and remain unto the morning of that joyous day are changed from mortality to immortality, from dishonor to glory, from an animal to a spiritual existence, and all united in giving glory to the great God of all through him who comes as King.

There are none here who sympathize with us, my wife and I, in what are termed our peculiar views; so our thoughts often revert to our blessed sabbath meetings; and although really absent we are, in fancy, present, mingling with our dear brethren and sisters with whom we have been wont to spend happy hours in offerings of adoration, praise and thanksgiving to Almighty God. Seasons when together we have been blessed, and, I trust, strengthened and fortified for the work that is before us and whereunto we have been called.

How much I wonder that, in spite of the great light which God is now causing to shine through his blessed word, so many deny the coming of Jesus, or how others can place the event such an, almost, interminable distance in the future. Did his persecutors, in token of derision and scorn, once place upon his head a crown of thorns? just so surely will he yet be crowned with the diadem of universal power upon the throne of his father David, for God hath spoken it, and it shall be. Did ungodly men, ever seeking to abuse, finally conspire against him and kill him? just so surely will there yet ascend songs of "hallelujah" from a world of saints redeemed by his blood. My earnest prayer is "even so come Lord Jesus, come quickly."

Yours in the blessed faith once delivered unto the saints.

From M. P. Martin.

Woodstock, N. B., May 29, 1865.

BR. STORRS:—There seems to be here a growing disposition to read the Herald of Life; and I hope those who conduct it may be sustained in their vigorous efforts to investigate the truth, as it is the rightful application of the truth that makes us free.

In the last few numbers of the Herald there has been considerable written in support of christian connection with the governments of this world. I hope it may lead to a correct understanding of the truth. In respect to it, most professed christians here, as well as in other lands, hold to those views, except the Adventists; they generally are professed followers in non-resistance.

I object to the word non resistance having any application to a true believer in Christ; for wherever there is spiritual life it gives additional power and resistance compared with animal life after the law; thus making us, or those of the Spirit, responsible for the fruits of the Spirit, which are love, joy, long suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance; against such there is no law. Gal. v. 22, 23; but if ye be led by the Spirit ye are not subject to ordinances.

As the stream cannot rise higher than the fountain, so christians cannot be expected to attain above their standard; and as the nations of the earth do not profess anything higher than civil or military power, shall we yield to them the right of dictating us in our choice whether we will serve them or Christ? If we do, then our religion can only be national, as was that of the Jews.

I think we have an excellent example in the prophet Daniel of the relation that a true follower of Christ sustains to the Governments of earth. Daniel approved of that which was good and right; he reproved that which was evil or wrong. He never took the oath of allegiance, I think, to the Babylonish government; and if I understand rightly, always remained a Hebrew. Neither was he dictated by them, but by his wisdom in remaining separate from the government, he was made an illustration of moral principle over physical force; plainly showing that the offices of the Spirit are persuasive; not compelling men to do right, but leaving them free to choose; so if they remain under the law they must be subject to the law; but if led by the Spirit we are not under the law.

It is true that Daniel rendered services to the government; and so should any christian be ready to do; and if compelled to go a mile, go two. The question at issue seems to be, Did Christ teach his disciples a strict spirituality of life; relieving them from all cum brances to their attainment to himself, as a standard, and promise them the Holy Spirit; and not only to them, but to all that would deny themselves and forsake all things for his sake? that they should be his disciples in all after time: and that his disciples were not national in character, but were spiritual; were to be scattered all over the world; to be known by the fruits of the Spirit, and that the nations of the world have no claim upon them farther than as lights in the world.

I am glad to notice that Great Britian and the United States have had respect to this principle; and I think the late and much lamented President recognized this fact that Christ's followers were wholly subject to him; that it is an individual choice as much as it would be whether one would be a British or an American subject; the nations of the earth having a right to claim all, except Christ's; they from full choice, having become his, thus rendering to God the things that are God's and to Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's.

A friend sends $5 and says:—I would like to have it appropriated for the benefit of the emancipated colored people, if you have any way you can use it for their spiritual welfare; if not, appropriate it in any way you think best. I am a little apprehensive that as a nation we have not quite moral honesty enough to make whole men, politically, of the long oppressed race immediately; but I have an abiding faith that as our Father has laid his hand to the matter it will be accomplised in due time; otherwise we will have to suffer for our negligence. I am sorry to see that the late slave oppressors have still a strong disposition to grind these poor people to the dust, as much as in them lies. God is just and will do his will, let the blow fall when it may.

Yours, fraternally.

NOTE BY EDITOR.—Let us look to God that the rulers of this nation may have hearts to execute justice and judgment in the land. We fully believe, if any compromise is now made in this matter short of such executive administration, that a heavier judgment awaits the nation than that through which it has just passed. Let it be warned in time; and may Heaven avert the second visitation by disposing all concerned to make good the oath and pledge of our fathers, that "all men are created free and equal, and are endowed by their CREATOR with certain inalienable rights, among which are life liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." On this oath and pledge God gave our fathers their nationality; for the persistent violition of that oath and pledge for more than eighty years, and refusing to repent under all the warnings given to the nation, our "Creator," at last, brought us unto judgment; and the last four years have been the lesson God has given the people of this land, and to the world, that though He bare long with the wickesness of a people, they shall not always go unpunished. Let the nation beware that it does not now neglect to redeem the oath and pledge of our fathers.

CARY A. SLAYTON, Hospital Steward "57th Reg. Pa. Vet. Vol., in Camp near Washington D. C.," June 22, writes:—I send you $5. Two for my paper, and three for the "Missionary Horse;" or otherwise as you see proper. I shall trust to your decision as to how it ought to be used. I shall try to send more subscribers soon. It is a very dull time here, now, for the men and boys in the army. They have not been paid for some time, and it is rather unhealthy.

Under date of June 28, he again writes:—As my Regiment will leave here in two or three days for home, I wish you to change my paper to Titusville, Pa. I received it for this week this evening. We shall, the good Lord willing, get home to enjoy the society of our families in the course of a week or ten days. I am happy to hear that the doctrines and teachings of your paper are meeting with such success in the Western field.

PETER FISH, Greenwich, N. Y., writes:—I am well pleased and greatly benefitted by the use of your valuable paper. May God bless you with a long life, a clear mind and much success in your labor of love for poor fallen men. There is but a handful of us in this vicinity who believe in no life out of Christ. There are large "orthodox" churches in the place; but none to preach life only in Christ. We wish some one of the Advent Union preachers could make it convenient to call on us and preach a few times. I think great good might be the result.

Strength of Character.

Strength of character consists of two things—power of will and power of self-restraint. It requires two things, therefore, for its existence—strong feelings and strong command over them. Now we all very often mistake strong feelings for strong character. A man who bears all before him, before whose frown domestics tremble and whose bursts of fury make the children of the household quake—because he has will obeyed and his own way in all things—we call him a strong man. The truth is, that he is a weak man; it is his passions that are strong; he, mastered by them, is weak. You must measure the strength of a man by the power of the feelings he subdues, not by the power of those that subdue him. And hence composure is very often the highest result of strength. Did we ever see a man receiving a flagrant injury, and then reply quietly? That is a man spiritually strong. Or did we ever see a man in anguish stand, as if carved out of a solid rock, mastering himself? Or one bearing a hopeless daily trial, remain silent and never tell the world what cankered his home peace? That is strength. He who, with strong passions, remains chaste; he who, keenly sensative, with manly powers of indignation in him, can be provoked and yet restrain himself and forgive, these men are strong men, the spiritual heroes.

To believe that the superstitious are after all, on the safe side, is to believe that it is safe to combine with the medicines of a skilful physician, all the nostrums of all the ignorant practitioners in the neighborhood.—Bishop Whately.

STORRS; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This word contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in plain binding, 50 cents; in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near ten years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER: OR, MAN IN DEATH; AND THE HOPE FOR A FUTURE LIFE.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead, can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none there fore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD; OR, THE RIGHTEOUS ONLY WILL LIVE AGAIN. By GEO. STORRS. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the EDITOR of the HERALD OF LIFE. Price, $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.—IMMORTALITY: The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev, T. M. POST, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by GEO. STORRS. Price in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. POST, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a Prize Essay on IMMORTALITY, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men, with nt egard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The REVIEWER followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The Author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

BIBLE VS. TRADITION: in which the True Teaching of the Bible is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity Life, Death, &c. Price, bound, $1. Postage 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. It is a work of much labor and research. The title indicates its object, and the performance shows the object was kept in view throughout. The language is sometimes severe on what is called "orthodoxy—more so than is desirable—but the value of the work, in general, cannot be over-estimated. Thou sands of it have been sent abroad, and thousand more ought to be scattered. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subjects; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

Poetry.

IN THE MORNING.

I shall know thee in the morning,
When Jesus calls his own;
In the resurrection morning,
When our heavenly joys are won;
On the right hand where they gather;
Who are fitted for the prize;
I shall know thee in the morning,
When all the saints arise.

I shall see thee in the morning,
When the stream of life runs fair,
Where the sunlight glids the highlands,
And music fills the air;
Where the flower-decked arbors lavish
Their odors fresh and free,
I shall meet thee in the morning
Of a bright eternity.

I shall see thee in the morning
Of heaven's eternal light,
Where the saints of every nation
Are robed in changeless white;
With Jesus and his angels,
The glad hosts of the skies,
I shall see thee in the morning,
When all the saints arise.

I shall join thee in the morning
Where partings never come,
Where those we've loved in Jesus
Forever are at home.
We'll range the plains together,
And joy in bliss untold,
I shall join thee in the morning,
Where the streets are paved with gold.

I shall greet thee in the morning,
Where sainted ones all meet;
Within those walls of jasper
We'll bow at Jesus' feet.
Where every singing seraph
His harp of glory tries,—
I shall greet thee in the morning,
When all the saints arise.

I shall know thee in the morning,
With the waking sainted dead,
Cheered by the gladsome presence
Of Christ our living Head;
Arrayed in robes of brightness,
Exultant for the prize;
I shall know thee in the morning,
When all the saints arise.

Children's Department.

THE LENT HALF DOLLAR.

Children generally have sensitive hearts to sympathize with suffering, and relieve it, but they don't always have faith like Charles, in the following story, that what they give to the Lord shall be returned to them again:

When Charlie Gleason was about ten years old, a bright half dollar was given him by his grandfather, to buy any thing he pleased for his New Year's present. The boy's mother had that morning taught him the verse, "He that hath pity on the poor lendeth to the Lord; and that which he hath given will he pay him again." The words were running in the boy's mind while he was on his way to the store to purchase a toy, which he had seen in the window of the shop on the previous day.

Just before Charlie reached the store, he met a poor woman who had sometimes washed for his mother, and she seemed to be in great distress.

"What's the matter, Hannah?" said the kind hearted child.

"O, Master Charlie, I've got to be turned into the street this cold morning, and my little Bill so sick, too!"

"Turned into the street, you and Bill! what for?"

"Because I can't raise my weekly rent. I've just been to see my landlord, and he says its three days overdue, and he'll not wait another hour. There go the men now to put my bed, and stove, and few things, on the sidewalk. O, what will I do?"

"How much is your rent, Hannah?" asked the boy, with a choking voice.

"It's half a dollar," said the woman. "It will kill Bill to be put out in this cold; and sure I will die with him."

"No, you won't; no, you sha'n't," said the tender hearted child, and feeling in his pocket, he brought forth his treasured half-dollar, and placed it quickly in her hand. Seeing she hesitated to keep it, notwithstanding her great need, Charlie told her it was all his own to spend as he pleased, and that he would rather give it to her than have the nicest toy in the store. Then walking away swiftly from the shop window, which were all full of tempting New Year's presents, he went bravely home to his mother, sure of her approbation.

The first person he met was his grandfather. He had observed Charlie go down the street, and was waiting for his return, that he might see what he had bought. So his first salutation was,

"Well, child, what have you done with your money?"

Now, Charlie's grandfather was not a religious man, and the boy knew that, though he sometimes gave money to his relations, he seldom or never bestowed it upon the poor; so he rather disliked to tell him what he had done with his money; but while he hesitated, the verse which he had that morning learned came into his mind, and helped him to an answer. Looking pleasantly into his grandfather's face, he said,

"I've lent it, sir."

"Lent your half dollar! Foolish boy. You'll never get it again, I know."

"O yes, I shall, grandpa, for I've got a promise to pay."

"You mean a note, I 'spose; but it isn't worth a cent."

"O yes, grandpa, it's perfectly good. I'm sure about it, for it is in the Bible."

"You mean you've put it there for safe keeping, eh? Let me see it."

Charlie brought the book and showed him the verse: "He that hath pity on the poor lendeth to the Lord; and that which he hath given will be pay him again."

"So you gave your money to some poor scamp. Well, you'll never see it again. Who's got it, pray?"

"I gave it to Hannah Green, sir." and Charlie told him her sad story.

"O, fudge," said his grandfather, "you can't pay poor folks' rent; its all nonsense. And now you've lost your New Year's present, or will, if I don't make it up to you. Here," he added, as he threw him another half dollar, "seeing your money's gone where you never will get it again, I must give you some more, I suppose."

"O, thank you," said Charlie, heartily. "I knew the Lord would pay me again, grandpa, because the Bible says so; but I didn't expect to get it so quick."

"That boy's too much for me," said the old gentleman; and he walked quickly away.

TRY AGAIN.

"Will you let your son attend Sunday school, ma'am?" said a Sunday school teacher to a mother to who did not cherish the fear of God in her heart.

"I don't care if he does, for I am glad to get him out of the house, especially on Sabbaths. He is an unruly fellow; and if you can manage him I shall be glad, for I'm sure I can't."

With this ungracious permission from the mother, the teacher took the boy. But the good man soon found that this boy was more than he could manage. Though only ten years old, he soon became the plague of the class and the Arab of the whole school. He was brimful of antics. Now he would pinch a child near him till he screamed, and when charged with the offense stoutly deny it with a face grave and solemn. Vainly did the teacher rebuke and entreat. Wickedness and mischief were his delight, and he would not be restrained. Finding him so incurably disobedient, the teacher had him turned out of school. But when the deed was done, he reflected, "I have turned that boy out of school. Into what have I turned him? The streets—to the care of a mother who has no control over him whatever. What will become of him? He will certainly be ruined. I cannot give him up; I will try him again."

Once more the boy was taken into that teacher's class. But he had by no means improved by expulsion. He was as reckless, troublesome, ungovernable as before. No school could tolerate such a pupil.

What more could the teacher do? He took the little rebel after school into a small class-room, and begged him to kneel by his side. The boy knelt, the preacher prayed, and the heart of the boy was touched. The teacher arose, and taking the hand of his pupil told him how Jesus loved him, and died to save him. The boy's heart melted; the tears poured down his cheeks, and between the intervals of his own sobs and his teacher's remarks he said:

"I never knew this before; I never thought of it before; I never believed any one loved me; I never thought I was wicked, and that Jesus saw me."

That half hour of prayer and personal instruction did the work. The young rebel was subdued. His heart was won. Henceforth he became a quiet, industrious, faithful scholar. The seeds of a strong, healthy piety grew apace within him.

Years rolled round, and that wild boy became an upright man, a Christian sailor. He is now mate of a large merchant vessel, a distributer of tracts, Bible, and religious books, the supporter of his mother and family, and a zealous friend of his former teacher. In a word all the surplus vitality which, when guided by his self-will and fancy, made him so intractable, is now turned into channels of Christian activity, and he is as earnest for Christ as he was formerly for Satan.

What if that teacher had not tried that boy again? In all probability he would have been brought to disgrace. Trying again in that half hour of personal effort, with God's blessing, saved him.—The Quiver.

POPERY.

Hartford, Conn, June 24, 1865.

It seems that the Pope of Rome is not the only Pope. He does the thinking and is authorative in doctrine for the Roman Catholic Church. There are Protestant Popes; men who do the thinking for their followers. Until last Sunday I was not aware that we have a second advent Pope. But it has come out clearly in a sermon delivered here last sabbath by the Reverend H. M., who was understood to say, that those persons who deny the resurrection of the wicked "ha'nt intellect enough to comprehend the truth." They "ha'nt" brains enough to grasp the great idea of a coming forth to (a second) Adamic life and afterwards raised a spiritual body, or immortal.

It is useless I suppose for me to presume to comprehend, but I have an idea that he preaches that all will come forth from their graves to Adamic life, and the righteous (dead) with the righteous living will afterwards be changed to immortality, or immortal life. All that have been raised (he was understood to include Christ) have been raised, or rather come forth to Adamic life; such as Lazarus, the Widow's Son; and even Christ himself came forth mortal, and was afterwards changed; i. e., when he was raised or ascended. So all his follows will be raised and changed as he was; in proof of which, he brought forth the Scripture, which possibly (as you "ha'nt brains" enough) you may not have discovered is proof positive, viz., "As in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive." There now you have it! No one any longer to contend for what you (for want of brains) have heretofore regarded as "the faith once delivered to the saints;" and yourself and all of us are henceforth saved from the labor of "investigating" and thinking; and, of course, are relieved from all responsibility; for if we "ha'nt brains" we are not accountable.

Let us have a Pope: and I don't know as we can get a more suitable one than the Reverend preacher who has "investigated" and now modestly assumes that position, and announced to his hearers, (I will not say followers) that (except they agree with him) they have not brains, or intellect enough to comprehend the sublime truth which he so modestly proclaims to the benighted and unfortunate believers in the non-resurrection of the wicked.

Now I can understand what a certain other preacher meant, when in conversing with a lady on the camp-ground at Wilbraham, in 1864, he said, speaking of the believers in the non-resurrection of the wicked, "I can't see that they believe in anything but the non-resurrection of the wicked; and as for the Spirit of God, they are as destitute of it as an old hornet's nest." If you want the name of that preacher, I can give it.

Yours truly, W. S. O.

P. S. As they did not take up a contribution at the close of the Sermon, I conclude that his effort was not appreciated favorably for his Doctrine.

THE SOLDIER'S WIFE.

The Lord's people are a tried people, but their trials are employed to deepen the work of God in their own hearts, and to render them a blessing to others. The soul that walks closely with God will often see the hand of God in providence, and will be made a blessing, even when he may least expect it. Many a Christian has been made a source of blessing to his fellow-men when he has little thought of it, and much good has been done by the Lord's poor saints, of which they will never hear in the present world.

An illustration of this fact has just been brought to my knowledge, and as it is of recent date, and has never been published before, I wish to record it, for the comfort and encouragement of those who sow beside all waters.

A soldier's wife, with her three children, was passing through Essex, on her way to Chelmsford, Mass., it was a fine summer's evening, when she saw a young man standing at a farm-yard gate. She asked him if his master would allow her and her children to sleep in his barn? He said he thought he would; went and asked, and the farmer gave his consent, and told the young man to unite two trusses of straw for them to sleep on. The woman asked him where she could get a little water. He went to fetch her some, and brought her a small can of milk, for which she was very thankful. She then took some bread from her bundle, but before she began to eat she asked God to bless what she and her children were about to partake of, though it was only dry bread and milk. The youth felt interested, and sitting down on the lift of the barn door, watched them eat their meal.

After finishing their humble repast, the soldier's wife took from her parcel a New Testament, and said to the young man, "We are going to have reading and prayer before retiring to rest, to thank God for the mercies of the past day; if you will join us, I shall be pleased." He did so, and after reading the first ten verses of the 19th chapter of Luke, she prayed earnestly for the blessing of the Lord to rest upon the farmer, his family, his servants, and the young man, for the kindness she had received from them.

The simplicity of the prayer struck him, and her words sunk deep into the heart of the young man. He could not sleep. He rose early in the morning, and went to the barn, to ask the soldier's wife the way of salvation; but she was gone.

He told one of the servant girls what had passed, and she related it to her young mistress, who was pleased to relate the simple tale to the rest of the family. It led the whole of them to reflect; they looked for the verses read by the soldier's wife the previous night, sent for the young man to have the tale confirmed, who wept as he told the simple story, and closed by saying, "Salvation has come to my heart if it has not to this house, for I feel as I have never done before." The farmer, his family and the young man became constant hearers of the gospel, and there was evidently a great change in the whole of them.

"God moves in a mysterious way,
His wonders to perform."

Reader, do you ask a blessing on your meals? There are many soldiers and soldiers' wives who do not. Reader do you? Can you receive God's temporal mercies without thanksgiving? Can you enjoy your food without asking God's blessing? How can you expect it to nourish your bodies, to increase your strength, or fit you for your daily duties, without God's blessing? If you have hitherto neglected this important duty, neglect it no longer, but determine never to partake of another meal until you have sought God's blessing upon it.

Reader, do you have family prayer? If you do not, let the poor soldier's wife reprove you. She would not lie down with her children on the hay in the barn until she had praised God for the mercies of the day, sought his protection through the night and endeavored to bring down a blessing on the kind-hearted man who had allowed her to lodge in his barn. It is to be feared that family prayer is very much neglected by professing Christians, especially where there is only a mistress at the head of the household, or when visitors are present. But the soldier's wife invited the young man who was a stranger to her, to remain while she read God's word and offered up her evening prayers, and proved to be a messenger of mercy to his soul. If you do not have family prayer, make up your mind to begin at once. Set up the family altar to-night, and let nothing prevent you leading your household to God at a throne of grace.

Reader are you kind to the houseless and homeless? Caution should be exercised, but kindness should rule our conduct. "Be not forgetful to entertain strangers, for thereby some have entertained angels unawares." Neither the farmer nor the young man ever regretted their kindness to the soldier's wife, nor will they, for thus saith the Lord—"Whosoever shall give to drink unto one of these little ones a cup of cold water only, he shall in no wise lose his reward."

Once more, are you upon the look out for opportunities of usefulness? If so, they will daily occur, and when you least expect it, you may be made the greatest blessing. Sow the seed, and leave it. Bear your testimony, and go on your way. God will own it. The soldier's wife never heard the result of her prayer in the barn; but she may yet, for the day shall declare it. Aim to win souls to God. Aim to honor Jesus always and every where. Scatter the good seed as you pass along. Do good to all for Christ's sake. Be kind to his poor disciples. Ye who are of the household of faith, be specially kind to your poor brethren. Your reward in the great day of the Lord shall be regulated by your kindness to them. "When the Son of man shall come in his glory, and all the holy angels with him, then shall he sit upon the throne of his glory; and before him shall be gathered all nations: and he shall separate them one from another, as a shepherd divideth his sheep from the goats; and he shall set the sheep on his right hand, but the goats on the left. Then shall the King say unto them on his right hand, Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world: for I was an hungered, and ye gave me meat: I was thirsty, and ye gave me drink: I was a stranger and ye took me in: naked, and ye clothed me: I was sick, and ye visited me: I was in prison, and ye came unto me. Then shall the righteous answer him, saying, Lord, when saw we thee an hungered, and fed thee? or thirsty, and gave thee drink? When saw we thee a stranger, and took thee in? or naked, and clothed thee? or when saw we thee sick, or in prison, and came unto thee? And the King shall answer, and say unto them, Verily I say unto you, Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me."—Selected.

NONE OTHER NAME.

A few persons were collected round a blind man who had taken his station on a bridge over a London canal, and was reading from an embossed Bible. Receiving from those who passed by of their carnal things, he was administering to them of spiritual things. A gentleman on his way home from the city, was led by curiosity to the outskirts of the crowd. Just then the poor man, who was reading in the 4th chapter of Acts, lost his place, and while trying to find it with his fingers, kept repeating the last clause he had read—"none other name—none other name." Some of the people smiled at the blind man's embarrassment, but the gentleman went away deeply musing. He had lately become convinced that he was a sinner, and had been trying in many ways to obtain peace of mind. But religious exercises, good resolutions, altered habits, all were ineffectual to relieve his conscience of its load, and enable him to rejoice in God. The words he had heard from the blind man, however, rang their solemn music in his soul "none other name!" When he reached his home, and retired to rest, these words, like evening chimes from the village towers nestling among the trees, were still heard—"none other name, none other name, none other name." And when he awoke, in more joyful measures, like matin bells saluting the morn, the strain continued—"none other name, none other name." The music entered his soul and he awoke to a new life. I see it all! I see it all! I have been trying to be saved by my own work, my repentance, my prayers, my reformation. I see my mistake. It is Jesus alone can save me. To him I will look. "Neither is there salvation in any other. For there is none other name—none other name—none other name—given among men whereby they must be saved."

IMPERISHABLE.

God's word shall endure forever. Other things may perish, but it shall never die or decay.

O, what wreck and ruin meets the eye as it glances at the past! Thrones have crumbled, empires have fallen, and philosophers and their systems have vanished away. The very monuments of man's power have been converted into the mockery of his weakness. His eternal cities moulder in the ruins; the serpent hisses in the cabinet where he planned his empire, and echo is startled by the foot which breaks the silence that has reigned for ages in his hall of feast and song. Yet, notwithstanding all this desolation, the stream of truth, which first bubbled up at the foot of the Eternal Throne, has continued to roll on with silent majesty and might, bearing down each opposing barier, and declaring to perishing multitudes on its brink, that, "while all flesh is grass, and the glory of man as the flower of grass, the word of the Lord endureth forever."

No weapon that has ever been formed against the Bible has prospered. It has survived the power of secret treachery and open violence. The time has been when to read it was death. Numerous foes have risen up against it—Pagans who have aimed to destroy it, Papists who have striven to monopolize it, and ungodly men who have hated it for its purity and penalties; but from all these assaults it has been preserved. Though cast into fire, it has risen triumphant from its ashes; though crushed, yet, like the diamond, every part of which, when broken, exhibits the beauty of the whole, it has proved its indestructibility, and, though sunk in the waters, it has come up again studded with the costliest pearls. It has survived the shocks of all its enemies, and withstood the ravages of time. Like the fabled pillars of Seth, which are said to have bid defiance to the deluge, it has stood unmoved in the midst of that flood which sweeps away men, with their labors, into oblivion. Infidelity has fought against it with relentless malignity; but it has successfully resisted all its potency, passing unhurt through the hands of Julians, Celsuses, and Porphyrys, and defying all the sophistries of Hume, the eloquence of Gibbon, inuendoes of Rousseau, the blasphemy of Paine, and the vituperations of Voltaire. The identical press, indeed, which was employed by Voltaire and the French Institute to disseminate their attacks upon the Bible has since been used to print the very volume they so vainly sought to destroy. Thus has the word of the Lord lived and triumphed, while its adversaries, one after another, have been blasted.—Dr. Nevin.

SALT IS GOOD.

The following article was sent to the World's Crisis some time ago to be published in that paper, but was refused with a number of others at the time. The Editor assigned the following reason for rejecting them. "As they are of a personal character, it is thought we should violate the principles by which the paper [Crisis] is regulated, if inserted." He added, "We are sorry that we are not able to comply with your wishes and lay them before our readers." As he is sorry he could not lay them before the readers of the Crisis, it is fair to presume that he will be glad to have them published in any paper, if so, that at least, some of the readers of the Crisis may see them.

J. S. W.

"Why Salt is Healthful.—From time immemorial it has been known that without salt men would miserably perish; and among the horrible punishments entailing certain death, that of feeding culprits on saltless food is said to have prevailed in barbarous times. Maggots and corruption are spoken of by some writers as the distressing symptoms which saltless food engenders; but no ancient or unchemical modern could explain how such suffering arose. Now we know why the animal craves salt, why it suffers discomfort, and why it ultimately falls into disease if salt is for a time withheld. Upward of half the saline matter of the blood—fifty-seven per cent—consist of common salt, and as this is partly discharged every day through the skin and kidneys, the necessity of continued supplies of it to the healthy body becomes sufficiently obvious. The bile also contains soda as a special and indispensible constituent, and so do all the cartilages of the body. Stint the supply of salt therefore, and neither will the bile be able properly to assist digestion, nor the cartaliges to be built up again as fast as they naturally would waste."—Prof. Johnson.

I think this statement of Prof. Johnson is substantially true. I think that no person can long live in health without the use of salt. How much salt is necessary to give a proper supply to the blood may not be so easy to decide. Perhaps less than is sometimes used would be sufficient. For it is evident that any article may be over used. When that is done, injury may be the result. But this proves nothing against its quality or use; for if it did, then every article eaten should be rejected on the ground that the most harmless may be taken to such an amount as to produce sickness and even death.

If salt is in its nature, injurious, God never would have required holy men to salt meat and then eat it. And Jesus never would have said that salt is good, knowing that the use to which it was applied was to eat it with food to say nothing of the fact that he compared his church to salt.

Should it be said that salt may be dispensed with entirely, and still health be promoted or maintained for any length of time, I remark, that the experiment may be worth trying.

I have never yet been acquainted with the diet of any one in common health who did not, eat more or less salt. A person may imagine that he cannot, and does not eat salt, when at the same time he will eat corned beef, mince pie, the meat of which is salted, and all kinds of common pie, the crust of which is salted, and shortened with the fat of swine. He may even eat cheese, all of which is salted, and stewed oysters additionally salted, and peppered at that, and griddle cakes cooked in butter. Some there may be, who do not eat these articles, and still occasionally eat common bread, which is salted, and constantly eat or drink milk which contains a large proportion of salt, or eat food prepared in milk.

It may be said that infants, at the breast, do not eat salt; yet many of them are well. While they live on milk, they receive a sufficient amount of salt for them to preserve the blood in a healthy state.

If some should object to Prof. Johnsons' statement as being untrue, I would suggest some one of that number who is in good health, test his objection by entirely abstaining from the use of all articles containing salt; or, in other words, eat no salt whatever, for twelve months. When this shall be done with satisfactory evidence, and the person at the end of that time be found in good health, he will have an argument against the Prof. of sufficient importance to be noticed, while all the talk against the use of salt by them who are continually using it falls to the ground.

Remark by the Editor.—To give our readers an idea why Br. White has written as he has, it may be necessary to say, there are those in the Crisis' school who are very much opposed, theoretically, to the use of salt with food.

NAPOLEON III. AND AUGUSTUS CÆSAR.

The points of similarity between these two persons was some time since drawn by Pierse Healy, from Paris, as follows:

"Both were great under the shadow of mighty names; the names, one of an uncle, the other of a great uncle, and both the most famous captains and extraordinary geniuses of their time. Both nephews—both politicians by birth and social position—both were equally secret, equally false, equally dissimulating, equally unscrupulous, and equally displayed at broken intervals, rather the fitful audacity of the drunkard or the patient fortitude of the woman, than the elastic elements of high moral and physical heroism. Both bowed to the superstitions of stars, and amulets, and lucky epochs; the one wearing the charm of Charlemagne, the other the caul of a sea-calf. Both were men of small statures of partially deformed bodies, and both were abandoned to low and crapulous forms of dissipation. Both alike flattered, both deceived, both contemned, both served the people. Both equally used, equally abused, and equally disbelieved the religion of their time. Both married wives out of private stations—remarkable women both—one the wife, the other the betrothed of other men; the wives in both cases being confined within three months after their marriage, and neither husband deriving from them any other offspring. Both paid and intrigued, rather than achieved their way to greatness. Both had rather literary than military tastes, and reached, virtually, as civilians, the successions of military uncles and the chieftainhoods of military nations, acquiring, in both cases, their power by the favor of the soldiery and people, after long intrigues, by similar leases of tenure, at kindred epochs as to faith and morals, over kindred nations as to social characteristics, and amid similar sources of strength and weakness, and similar dangers and difficulties."

The Way to Conquer.—In all past ages the pious in times of trouble have found refuge and strength in prayer. This weapon of their warfare—not carnal but spiritual, and forged for them in the armory of heaven, has been mighty through God for their own deliverance and the overthrow of their enemies. "Is any afflicted let him pray." Commit thy cause unto the Lord, and so engage him on your side. When good Hezekiah received a letter containing the sad information that Sennacherib, the formidable king of Assyria, was about to attempt the capture and destruction of Jerusalem, we are told that he "went up into the house of the Lord and spread it before the Lord" in prayer. And he had power with God; his prayer was effectual, and the Lord sent a destroying angel against the Assyrian army, who slew in a single night 185,000 men. Thus Hezekiah upon his knees conquered Sennacherib; and this should be our resource in the present hour of national danger and distress. We should fight upon our knees. This will insure speedy and decisive victory. "Restraining prayer we cease to fight."

See Here, Smokers.—"The New York Post tells of a middle aged man who left off smoking twenty-five years ago, and has put in the bank what two or three cigars per day would have cost him, and now finds the amount to be two thousand five hundred dollars. Fast young men make a note of this."

Poetry.

IN THE MORNING.

I shall know thee in the morning,
When Jesus calls his own;
In the resurrection morning,
When our heavenly joys are won;
On the right hand where they gather;
Who are fitted for the prize;
I shall know thee in the morning,
When all the saints arise.

I shall see thee in the morning,
When the stream of life runs fair,
Where the sunlight glids the highlands,
And music fills the air;
Where the flower-decked arbors lavish
Their odors fresh and free,
I shall meet thee in the morning
Of a bright eternity.

I shall see thee in the morning
Of heaven's eternal light,
Where the saints of every nation
Are robed in changeless white;
With Jesus and his angels,
The glad hosts of the skies,
I shall see thee in the morning,
When all the saints arise.

I shall join thee in the morning
Where partings never come,
Where those we've loved in Jesus
Forever are at home.
We'll range the plains together,
And joy in bliss untold,
I shall join thee in the morning,
Where the streets are paved with gold.

I shall greet thee in the morning,
Where sainted ones all meet;
Within those walls of jasper
We'll bow at Jesus' feet.
Where every singing seraph
His harp of glory tries,—
I shall greet thee in the morning,
When all the saints arise.

I shall know thee in the morning,
With the waking sainted dead,
Cheered by the gladsome presence
Of Christ our living Head;
Arrayed in robes of brightness,
Exultant for the prize;
I shall know thee in the morning,
When all the saints arise.

Children's Department.

THE LENT HALF DOLLAR.

Children generally have sensitive hearts to sympathize with suffering, and relieve it, but they don't always have faith like Charles, in the following story, that what they give to the Lord shall be returned to them again:

When Charlie Gleason was about ten years old, a bright half-dollar was given him by his grandfather, to buy any thing he pleased for his New Year's present. The boy's mother had that morning taught him the verse, "He that hath pity on the poor lendeth to the Lord; and that which he hath given will he pay him again." The words were running in the boy's mind while he was on his way to the store to purchase a toy, which he had seen in the window of the shop on the previous day.

Just before Charlie reached the store, he met a poor woman who had sometimes washed for his mother, and she seemed to be in great distress.

"What's the matter, Hannah?" said the kind hearted child.

"O, Master Charlie, I've got to be turned into the street this cold morning, and my little Bill so sick, too!"

"Turned into the street, you and Bill! what for?"

"Because I can't raise my weekly rent. I've just been to see my landlord, and he says its three days overdue, and he'll not wait another hour. There go the men now to put my bed, and stove, and few things, on the sidewalk. O, what will I do?"

"How much is your rent, Hannah?" asked the boy, with a choking voice.

"It's half a dollar," said the woman. "It will kill Bill to be put out in this cold; and sure I will die with him."

"No, you won't; no, you sha'n't," said the tender hearted child, and feeling in his pocket, he brought forth his treasured half-dollar, and placed it quickly in her hand. Seeing she hesitated to keep it, notwithstanding her great need, Charlie told her it was all his own to spend as he pleased, and that he would rather give it to her than have the nicest toy in the store. Then walking away swiftly from the shop window, which were all full of tempting New Year's presents, he went bravely home to his mother, sure of her approbation.

The first person he met was his grandfather. He had observed Charlie go down the street, and was waiting for his return, that he might see what he had bought. So his first salutation was,

"Well, child, what have you done with your money?"

Now, Charlie's grandfather was not a religious man, and the boy knew that, though he sometimes gave money to his relations, he seldom or never bestowed it upon the poor; so he rather disliked to tell him what he had done with his money; but while he hesitated, the verse which he had that morning learned came into his mind, and helped him to an answer. Looking pleasantly into his grandfather's face, he said,

"I've lent it, sir."

"Lent your half dollar! Foolish boy. You'll never get it again, I know."

"O yes, I shall, grandpa, for I've got a promise to pay."

"You mean a note, I 'spose; but it isn't worth a cent."

"O yes, grandpa, it's perfectly good. I'm sure about it, for it is in the Bible."

"You mean you've put it there for safe keeping, eh? Let me see it."

Charlie brought the book and showed him the verse: "He that hath pity on the poor lendeth to the Lord; and that which he hath given will be pay him again."

"So you gave your money to some poor scamp. Well, you'll never see it again. Who's got it, pray?"

"I gave it to Hannah Green, sir." and Charlie told him her sad story.

"O, fudge," said his grandfather, "you can't pay poor folks' rent; its all nonsense. And now you've lost your New Year's present, or will, if I don't make it up to you. Here," he added, as he threw him another half dollar, "seeing your money's gone where you never will get it again, I must give you some more, I suppose."

"O, thank you," said Charlie, heartily. "I knew the Lord would pay me again, grandpa, because the Bible says so; but I didn't expect to get it so quick."

"That boy's too much for me," said the old gentleman; and he walked quickly away.

TRY AGAIN.

"Will you let your son attend Sunday school, ma'am?" said a Sunday school teacher to a mother to who did not cherish the fear of God in her heart.

"I don't care if he does, for I am glad to get him out of the house, especially on Sabbaths. He is an unruly fellow; and if you can manage him I shall be glad, for I'm sure I can't."

With this ungracious permission from the mother, the teacher took the boy. But the good man soon found that this boy was more than he could manage. Though only ten years old, he soon became the plague of the class and the Arab of the whole school. He was brimful of antics. Now he would pinch a child near him till he screamed, and when charged with the offense stoutly deny it with a face grave and solemn. Vainly did the teacher rebuke and entreat. Wickedness and mischief were his delight, and he would not be restrained. Finding him so incurably disobedient, the teacher had him turned out of school. But when the deed was done, he reflected, "I have turned that boy out of school. Into what have I turned him? The streets—to the care of a mother who has no control over him whatever. What will become of him? He will certainly be ruined. I cannot give him up; I will try him again."

Once more the boy was taken into that teacher's class. But he had by no means improved by expulsion. He was as reckless, troublesome, ungovernable as before. No school could tolerate such a pupil.

What more could the teacher do? He took the little rebel after school into a small class-room, and begged him to kneel by his side. The boy knelt, the preacher prayed, and the heart of the boy was touched. The teacher arose, and taking the hand of his pupil told him how Jesus loved him, and died to save him. The boy's heart melted; the tears poured down his cheeks, and between the intervals of his own sobs and his teacher's remarks he said:

"I never knew this before; I never thought of it before; I never believed any one loved me; I never thought I was wicked, and that Jesus saw me."

That half hour of prayer and personal instruction did the work. The young rebel was subdued. His heart was won. Henceforth he became a quiet, industrious, faithful scholar. The seeds of a strong, healthy piety grew apace within him.

Years rolled round, and that wild boy became an upright man, a Christian sailor. He is now mate of a large merchant vessel, a distributer of tracts, Bible, and religious books, the supporter of his mother and family, and a zealous friend of his former teacher. In a word all the surplus vitality which, when guided by his self-will and fancy, made him so intractable, is now turned into channels of Christian activity, and he is as earnest for Christ as he was formerly for Satan.

What if that teacher had not tried that boy again? In all probability he would have been brought to disgrace. Trying again in that half hour of personal effort, with God's blessing, saved him.—The Quiver.

POPERY.

HARTFORD, CONN, June 24, 1865.

It seems that the Pope of Rome is not the only Pope. He does the thinking and is authorative in doctrine for the Roman Catholic Church. There are Protestant Popes; men who do the thinking for their followers. Until last Sunday I was not aware that we have a second advent Pope. But it has come out clearly in a sermon delivered here last sabbath by the Reverend H. M., who was understood to say, that those persons who deny the resurrection of the wicked "ha'nt intellect enough to comprehend the truth." They "ha'nt" brains enough to grasp the great idea of a coming forth to (a second) Adamic life and afterwards raised a spiritual body, or immortal.

It is useless I suppose for me to presume to comprehend, but I have an idea that he preaches that all will come forth from their graves to Adamic life, and the righteous (dead) with the righteous living will afterwards be changed to immortality, or immortal life. All that have been raised (he was understood to include Christ) have been raised, or rather come forth to Adamic life; such as Lazarus, the Widow's Son; and even Christ himself came forth mortal, and was afterwards changed; i. e., when he was raised or ascended. So all his follows will be raised and changed as he was; in proof of which, he brought forth the Scripture, which possibly (as you "ha'nt brains" enough) you may not have discovered is proof positive, viz., "As in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive." There now you have it! No one any longer to contend for what you (for want of brains) have heretofore regarded as "the faith once delivered to the saints;" and yourself and all of us are henceforth saved from the labor of "investigating" and thinking; and, of course, are relieved from all responsibility; for if we "ha'nt brains" we are not accountable.

Let us have a Pope: and I don't know as we can get a more suitable one than the Reverend preacher who has "investigated" and now modestly assumes that position, and announced to his hearers, (I will not say followers) that (except they agree with him) they have not brains, or intellect enough to comprehend the sublime truth which he so modestly proclaims to the benighted and unfortunate believers in the non-resurrection of the wicked.

Now I can understand what a certain other preacher meant, when in conversing with a lady on the camp-ground at Wilbraham, in 1864, he said, speaking of the believers in the non-resurrection of the wicked, "I can't see that they believe in anything but the non-resurrection of the wicked; and as for the Spirit of God, they are as destitute of it as an old hornet's nest." If you want the name of that preacher, I can give it.

Yours truly, W. S. O.

P. S. As they did not take up a contribution at the close of the Sermon, I conclude that his effort was not appreciated favorably for his Doctrine.

THE SOLDIER'S WIFE.

The Lord's people are a tried people, but their trials are employed to deepen the work of God in their own hearts, and to render them a blessing to others. The soul that walks closely with God will often see the hand of God in providence, and will be made a blessing, even when he may least expect it. Many a Christian has been made a source of blessing to his fellow-men when he has little thought of it, and much good has been done by the Lord's poor saints, of which they will never hear in the present world.

An illustration of this fact has just been brought to my knowledge, and as it is of recent date, and has never been published before, I wish to record it, for the comfort and encouragement of those who sow beside all waters.

A soldier's wife, with her three children, was passing through Essex, on her way to Chelmsford, Mass., it was a fine summer's evening, when she saw a young man standing at a farm-yard gate. She asked him if his master would allow her and her children to sleep in his barn? He said he thought he would; went and asked, and the farmer gave his consent, and told the young man to unite two trusses of straw for them to sleep on. The woman asked him where she could get a little water. He went to fetch her some, and brought her a small can of milk, for which she was very thankful. She then took some bread from her bundle, but before she began to eat she asked God to bless what she and her children were about to partake of, though it was only dry bread and milk. The youth felt interested, and sitting down on the lift of the barn door, watched them eat their meal.

After finishing their humble repast, the soldier's wife took from her parcel a New Testament, and said to the young man, "We are going to have reading and prayer before retiring to rest, to thank God for the mercies of the past day; if you will join us, I shall be pleased." He did so, and after reading the first ten verses of the 19th chapter of Luke, she prayed earnestly for the blessing of the Lord to rest upon the farmer, his family, his servants, and the young man, for the kindness she had received from them.

The simplicity of the prayer struck him, and her words sunk deep into the heart of the young man. He could not sleep. He rose early in the morning, and went to the barn, to ask the soldier's wife the way of salvation; but she was gone.

He told one of the servant girls what had passed, and she related it to her young mistress, who was pleased to relate the simple tale to the rest of the family. It led the whole of them to reflect; they looked for the verses read by the soldier's wife the previous night, sent for the young man to have the tale confirmed, who wept as he told the simple story, and closed by saying, "Salvation has come to my heart if it has not to this house, for I feel as I have never done before." The farmer, his family and the young man became constant hearers of the gospel, and there was evidently a great change in the whole of them.

"God moves in a mysterious way,

Reader, do you ask a blessing on your meals? There are many soldiers and soldiers' wives who do not. Reader do you? Can you receive God's temporal mercies without thanksgiving? Can you enjoy your food without asking God's blessing? How can you expect it to nourish your bodies, to increase your strength, or fit you for your daily duties, without God's blessing? If you have hitherto neglected this important duty, neglect it no longer, but determine never to partake of another meal until you have sought God's blessing upon it.

Reader, do you have family prayer? If you do not, let the poor soldier's wife reprove you. She would not lie down with her children on the hay in the barn until she had praised God for the mercies of the day, sought his protection through the night and endeavored to bring down a blessing on the kind-hearted man who had allowed her to lodge in his barn. It is to be feared that family prayer is very much neglected by professing Christians, especially where there is only a mistress at the head of the household, or when visitors are present. But the soldier's wife invited the young man who was a stranger to her, to remain while she read God's word and offered up her evening prayers, and proved to be a messenger of mercy to his soul. If you do not have family prayer, make up your mind to begin at once. Set up the family altar to-night, and let nothing prevent you leading your household to God at a throne of grace.

Reader are you kind to the houseless and homeless? Caution should be exercised, but kindness should rule our conduct. "Be not forgetful to entertain strangers, for thereby some have entertained angels unawares." Neither the farmer nor the young man ever regretted their kindness to the soldier's wife, nor will they, for thus saith the Lord—"Whosoever shall give to drink unto one of these little ones a cup of cold water only, he shall in no wise lose his reward."

Once more, are you upon the look out for opportunities of usefulness? If so, they will daily occur, and when you least expect it, you may be made the greatest blessing. Sow the seed, and leave it. Bear your testimony, and go on your way. God will own it. The soldier's wife never heard the result of her prayer in the barn; but she may yet, for the day shall declare it. Aim to win souls to God. Aim to honor Jesus always and every where. Scatter the good seed as you pass along. Do good to all for Christ's sake. Be kind to his poor disciples. Ye who are of the household of faith, be specially kind to your poor brethren. Your reward in the great day of the Lord shall be regulated by your kindness to them. "When the Son of man shall come in his glory, and all the holy angels with him, then shall he sit upon the throne of his glory; and before him shall be gathered all nations: and he shall separate them one from another, as a shepherd divideth his sheep from the goats; and he shall set the sheep on his right hand, but the goats on the left. Then shall the King say unto them on his right hand, Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world: for I was an hungered, and ye gave me meat: I was thirsty, and ye gave me drink: I was a stranger and ye took me in: naked, and ye clothed me: I was sick, and ye visited me: I was in prison, and ye came unto me. Then shall the righteous answer him, saying, Lord, when saw we thee an hungered, and fed thee? or thirsty, and gave thee drink? When saw we thee a stranger, and took thee in? or naked, and clothed thee? or when saw we thee sick, or in prison, and came unto thee? And the King shall answer, and say unto them, Verily I say unto you, Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me."—Selected.

NONE OTHER NAME.

A few persons were collected round a blind man who had taken his station on a bridge over a London canal, and was reading from an embossed Bible. Receiving from those who passed by of their carnal things, he was administering to them of spiritual things. A gentleman on his way home from the city, was led by curiosity to the outskirts of the crowd. Just then the poor man, who was reading in the 4th chapter of Acts, lost his place, and while trying to find it with his fingers, kept repeating the last clause he had read—"none other name—none other name." Some of the people smiled at the blind man's embarrassment, but the gentleman went away deeply musing. He had lately become convinced that he was a sinner, and had been trying in many ways to obtain peace of mind. But religious exercises, good resolutions, altered habits, all were ineffectual to relieve his conscience of its load, and enable him to rejoice in God. The words he had heard from the blind man, however, rang their solemn music in his soul "none other name!" When he reached his home, and retired to rest, these words, like evening chimes from the village towers nestling among the trees, were still heard—"none other name, none other name, none other name." And when he awoke, in more joyful measures, like matin bells saluting the morn, the strain continued—"none other name, none other name." The music entered his soul and he awoke to a new life. · I see it all! I see it all! I have been trying to be saved by my own work, my repentance, my prayers, my reformation. I see my mistake. It is Jesus alone can save me. To him I will look. "Neither is there salvation in any other. For there is none other name—none other name—none other name—given among men whereby they must be saved."

IMPERISHABLE.

God's word shall endure forever. Other things may perish, but it shall never die or decay.

O, what wreck and ruin meets the eye as it glances at the past! Thrones have crumbled, empires have fallen, and philosophers and their systems have vanished away. The very monuments of man's power have been converted into the mockery of his weakness. His eternal cities moulder in the ruins; the serpent hisses in the cabinet where he planned his empire, and echo is startled by the foot which breaks the silence that has reigned for ages in his hall of feast and song. Yet, notwithstanding all this desolation, the stream of truth, which first bubbled up at the foot of the Eternal Throne, has continued to roll on with silent majesty and might, bearing down each opposing barier, and declaring to perishing multitudes on its brink, that, "while all flesh is grass, and the glory of man as the flower of grass, the word of the Lord endureth forever."

No weapon that has ever been formed against the Bible has prospered. It has survived the power of secret treachery and open violence. The time has been when to read it was death. Numerous foes have risen up against it—Pagans who have aimed to destroy it, Papists who have striven to monopolize it, and ungodly men who have hated it for its purity and penalties; but from all these assaults it has been preserved. Though cast into fire, it has risen triumphant from its ashes; though crushed, yet, like the diamond, every part of which, when broken, exhibits the beauty of the whole, it has proved its indestructibility, and, though sunk in the waters, it has come up again studded with the costliest pearls. It has survived the shocks of all its enemies, and withstood the ravages of time. Like the fabled pillars of Seth, which are said to have bid defiance to the deluge, it has stood unmoved in the midst of that flood which sweeps away men, with their labors, into oblivion. Infidelity has fought against it with relentless malignity; but it has successfully resisted all its potency, passing unhurt through the hands of Julians, Celsuses, and Porphyrys, and defying all the sophistries of Hume, the eloquence of Gibbon, inuendoes of Rousseau, the blasphemy of Paine, and the vituperations of Voltaire. The identical press, indeed, which was employed by Voltaire and the French Institute to disseminate their attacks upon the Bible has since been used to print the very volume they so vainly sought to destroy. Thus has the word of the Lord lived and triumphed, while its adversaries, one after another, have been blasted.—Dr. Nevin.

SALT IS GOOD.

The following article was sent to the World's Crisis some time ago to be published in that paper, but was refused with a number of others at the time. The Editor assigned the following reason for rejecting them. "As they are of a personal character, it is thought we should violate the principles by which the paper [Crisis] is regulated, if inserted." He added, "We are sorry that we are not able to comply with your wishes and lay them before our readers." As he is sorry he could not lay them before the readers of the Crisis, it is fair to presume that he will be glad to have them published in any paper, if so, that at least, some of the readers of the Crisis may see them. J. S. W.

"WHY SALT IS HEALTHFUL.—From time immemorial it has been known that without salt men would miserably perish; and among the horrible punishments entailing certain death, that of feeding culprits on saltless food is said to have prevailed in barbarous times. Maggots and corruption are spoken of by some writers as the distressing symptoms which saltless food engenders; but no ancient or unchemical modern could explain how such suffering arose. Now we know why the animal craves salt, why it suffers discomfort, and why it ultimately falls into disease if salt is for a time withheld. Upward of half the saline matter of the blood—fifty-seven per cent—consist of common salt, and as this is partly discharged every day through the skin and kidneys, the necessity of continued supplies of it to the healthy body becomes sufficiently obvious. The bile also contains soda as a special and indispensible constituent, and so do all the cartilages of the body. Stint the supply of salt therefore, and neither will the bile be able properly to assist digestion, nor the cartaliges to be built up again as fast as they naturally would waste."—Prof. Johnson.

I think this statement of Prof. Johnson is substantially true. I think that no person can long live in health without the use of salt. How much salt is necessary to give a proper supply to the blood may not be so easy to decide. Perhaps less than is sometimes used would be sufficient. For it is evident that any article may be over used. When that is done, injury may be the result. But this proves nothing against its quality or use; for if it did, then every article eaten should be rejected on the ground that the most harmless may be taken to such an amount as to produce sickness and even death.

If salt is in its nature, injurious, God never would have required holy men to salt meat and then eat it. And Jesus never would have said that salt is good, knowing that the use to which it was applied was to eat it with food to say nothing of the fact that he compared his church to salt.

Should it be said that salt may be dispensed with entirely, and still health be promoted or maintained for any length of time, I remark, that the experiment may be worth trying.

I have never yet been acquainted with the diet of any one in common health who did not, eat more or less salt. A person may imagine that he cannot, and does not eat salt, when at the same time he will eat corned beef, mince pie, the meat of which is salted, and all kinds of common pie, the crust of which is salted, and shortened with the fat of swine. He may even eat cheese, all of which is salted, and stewed oysters additionally salted, and peppered at that, and griddle cakes cooked in butter. Some there may be, who do not eat these articles, and still occasionally eat common bread, which is salted, and constantly eat or drink milk which contains a large proportion of salt, or eat food prepared in milk.

It may be said that infants, at the breast, do not eat salt; yet many of them are well. While they live on milk, they receive a sufficient amount of salt for them to preserve the blood in a healthy state.

If some should object to Prof. Johnsons' statement as being untrue, I would suggest some one of that number who is in good health, test his objection by entirely abstaining from the use of all articles containing salt; or, in other words, eat no salt whatever, for twelve months. When this shall be done with satisfactory evidence, and the person at the end of that time be found in good health, he will have an argument against the Prof. of sufficient importance to be noticed, while all the talk against the use of salt by them who are continually using it falls to the ground.

NAPOLEON III. AND AUGUSTUS CÆSAR.

The points of similarity between these two persons was some time since drawn by PIERSE HEALY, from Paris, as follows:

"Both were great under the shadow of mighty names; the names, one of an uncle, the other of a great uncle, and both the most famous captains and extraordinary geniuses of their time. Both nephews—both politicians by birth and social position—both were equally secret, equally false, equally dissimulating, equally unscrupulous, and equally displayed at broken intervals, rather the fitful audacity of the drunkard or the patient fortitude of the woman, than the elastic elements of high moral and physical heroism. Both bowed to the superstitions of stars, and amulets, and lucky epochs; the one wearing the charm of Charlemagne, the other the caul of a sea-calf. Both were men of small statures of partially deformed bodies, and both were abandoned to low and crapulous forms of dissipation. Both alike flattered, both deceived, both contemned, both served the people. Both equally used, equally abused, and equally disbelieved the religion of their time. Both married wives out of private stations—remarkable women both—one the wife, the other the betrothed of other men; the wives in both cases being confined within three months after their marriage, and neither husband deriving from them any other offspring. Both paid and intrigued, rather than achieved their way to greatness. Both had rather literary than military tastes, and reached, virtually, as civilians, the successions of military uncles and the chieftainhoods of military nations, acquiring, in both cases, their power by the favor of the soldiery and people, after long intrigues, by similar leases of tenure, at kindred epochs as to faith and morals, over kindred nations as to social characteristics, and amid similar sources of strength and weakness, and similar dangers and difficulties."

THE WAY TO CONQUER.—In all past ages the pious in times of trouble have found refuge and strength in prayer. This weapon of their warfare—not carnal but spiritual, and forged for them in the armory of heaven, has been mighty through God for their own deliverance and the overthrow of their enemies. "Is any afflicted let him pray." Commit thy cause unto the Lord, and so engage him on your side. When good Hezekiah received a letter containing the sad information that Sennacherib, the formidable king of Assyria, was about to attempt the capture and destruction of Jerusalem, we are told that he "went up into the house of the Lord and spread it before the Lord" in prayer. And he had power with God; his prayer was effectual, and the Lord sent a destroying angel against the Assyrian army, who slew in a single night 185,000 men. Thus Hezekiah upon his knees conquered Sennacherib; and this should be our resource in the present hour of national danger and distress. We should fight upon our knees. This will insure speedy and decisive victory. "Restraining prayer we cease to fight."

BISHOP NEWTON ON FUTURE TORMENT.

We referred last week to the fact that Bishop Newton was led into the Restoration doctrine by his belief in the immortality of the soul. To show such was the fact, we give our readers the following extracts, which we copied some twenty years ago from his Works, London Edition 1787. They show the inextricable dilemma into which a powerful mind was plunged by the belief of man's natural immortality. We believe that nearly all believers in inherent immortality are, though unconscious of it themselves, Restorationists. The Bishop's topic, in "Discrtation" No. 60 is —"On the final state and condition of man." He is really a very great "heretic." "Hell," he says, "as a place of torment, is no where mentioned in the writings of Moses," &c. He then goes on to tell us that—

"Gehenna is the more usual name for the place of torment, and better known among the Jews; but the origin of this name is of a later date. Gehenna, or the valley of Hinnom, the name of the old proprietor of the land, was a place in the neighborhood of Jerusalem, where the worshippers of Moloch offered and burnt in the fire their sons and daughters to that grim idol; and that part, where these sacrifices were made, was called TOPHET from Toph, a drum, drums and such like noisy instruments being employed to drown the cries of these miserable children. The good king Josiah defiled the place, cut down the groves, brake down the images and altars, and filled with dead men's bones, the bones of the priests who sacrificed there, and henceforth it became a kind of common sewer, where all the carrion, garbage and offals of the city were thrown, and to prevent any infection, a fire was kept continually burning to consume them.

"This valley was further signalized by two memorable occurrences before and after this time. For here it was that Sennacherib, the king of Assyria's army, consisting of 185,000 men, were all slain in one night, and their bodies consumed by fire, according to the prophecy of Isaiah xxx. 31, 33, 'For through the voice of the Lord shall the Assyrian be beaten down, which smote with a rod.... For Tophet is ordained of old; yea, for the king it is prepared; he hath made it deep and large: the pile thereof is fire and much wood; the breath of the Lord, like a stream of brimstone, doth kindle it. Here also was a great slaughter and massacre of the idolatrous Jews by the Babylonians, and carcasses, more than could be buried, were left a prey to the birds of the air, and the beasts of the field, according to the prediction of Jeremiah vii. 31–33, 'And they have built the high places of Tophet, which is in the valley of the son of Hinnom, to burn their sons and their daughters in the fire; which I commanded them not, neither came it into my heart. Therefore, behold, the days come, saith the Lord, that it shall no more be called Tophet, nor the valley of the son of Hinnom, but the valley of slaughter: for they shall bury in Tophet, till there be no place. And the carcases of this people shall be meat for the fowls of the heaven, and for the beasts of the earth; and none shall fray them away.'

"Such a horrid place as this, so deservedly execrated both by God and man, the stage of such destruction, the scene of such continual burning, was fitly considered by the Jews as a type and figure of hell-fire, and the name is adopted and repeated several times by our Saviour himself in the gospels. One other name is used in Scripture for the place of torment, 'The lake of fire and brimstone,' which is a manifest allusion to the lake Asphaltites, where Sodom and Gomorrah and the cities of the plain were overthrown by brimstone and fire from heaven, and as St. Jude saith, 7, 'are set forth as an ensample suffering the vengeance of eternal fire.' For men have no other way of expressing the invisible things of a future state but by some sensible objects, such as they have seen or known, or been accustomed to in this world.

"We cannot in the least discover, in what part of infinite space will be the mansions of just men made perfect. Neither can we learn with any more certainty which is the place of hell. Some have imagined, that the fire at the centre of the earth is the fire of hell: but it hath never been proved that there is any such central fire: it contradicts all our notions of philosophy. If there be any such conflagration; but after the general conflagration we are assured, there will be a fire, it may be prepared ready for the general 'new heavens and a new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness,' and consequently there can be no such place as hell. Others have conceived that a comet, and others again that the sun will be the place of hell. There the fire is already kindled; but the Lord of the universe can easily kindle any star or planet, that it shall immediately become a furnace of fire for the punishment of rebellious creatures against their Creator."

Such endless conjectures are men, great men, led into, who depart from the plain Scripture testimony, that "the righteous shall be recompensed in the earth; much more the wicked and the sinner;" and that the portion of the sinner is to burned "up root and branch;" &c. But Bishop Newton had adopted the philosophy that the soul is immortal; which, as Martin Luther once said, is among the "monstrous opinions to be found in the Roman dunghill of decretals."—Defence, prop. 27, published 1530.

The Bishop next speaks of the duration and different degrees of rewards and punishments. As to the nature of these things he follows exactly the so-called "orthodox" strain of reasoning—dwelling upon the same texts on which they rely, and states his opinion that "the fire of hell is not metaphorical but real." After having dwelt upon the different degrees of bliss and misery, he says:—

"But the greatest difficulty of all yet remains to be considered, which is the duration of the happiness of the blessed, and of the misery of the damned. Matt. xxv. 46, 'And these shall go away into everlasting punishment: and the righteous into life eternal.' That the righteous should be rewarded with everlasting happiness is readily admitted; it is what every one wishes, and what every one therefore easily believes: but that the wicked should be punished with eternal misery, is of a harder digestion; it is not perhaps for men's interest that it should be true, and therefore they are willing to hope and believe that it may be false. And this article, I believe, hath not only stuck with infidels, but hath also raised scruples in the minds of many serious Christians. For indeed it is one of the most knotty points of divinity, and the hardest to be reconciled to our reason. Some assert in the strongest terms the eternity of hell-torments, others as peremtorily deny it, but for my part, I cannot entirely approve either the arguments usually urged in support of this doctrine, or the objections usually made against it. The truth may possibly lie in the mid-way between both," &c.

The Bishop then examines the subject, and attempts to disprove the doctrine of "annihition." After quoting the usual texts to prove the doctrine of the eternal torments of the wicked; he says:—

"But the words 'everlasting,' 'eternal,' 'forever,' and the like are sometimes used in a limited sense, and do not always signify an endless duration; and therefore though the punishment of the wicked be called 'everlasting,' 'eternal,' yet may it not for all that be of endless duration.... When Sodom and Gomorrah and the cities about them are spoken of, by Jude, as suffering the vengeance of eternal fire; the fire continued no longer than till it had reduced them to utter destruction. The sense therefore is limited by the nature of the thing: but when the nature of the thing doth not limit and restrain it, the words should certainly be taken in their proper and genuine signification.... It must be admitted that God has threatened everlasting misery to the wicked as plainly and positively as he hath promised everlasting happiness to the righteous.... You cannot complain of injustice, for the rewards and punishments are equal: and it was really necessary that the rewards and punishments should be declared everlasting.... You cannot then complain that the sanction of eternal penalties is unreasonable, for you see plainly that it is no more than is absolutely necessary; but possibly you may think, though it may be necessary in the government of this world for such things to be denounced by God and believed by men, yet there may not be the like necessity for inflicting them in the world to come. God is not obliged to execute his threatenings, as he is his promises. But why is he not obliged to perform the one as well as the other?.... If God will not execute as well as threaten, why does he threaten at all?.... There is then sufficient reason to conclude that God will fully execute his threatenings as well as make good his promises, and the rewards and punishments consequent thereupon will be really and truly everlasting;.... and as long as they retain the same qualities, so long they will keep the same station; as long as they remain righteous or wicked, so long they will remain happy or miserable even to all eternity."

The Bishop then proceeds with a long and labored argument to show that it is possible for the righteous in heaven to "commit iniquity," and asks, if "he should still continue in glory?" So "if the wicked should turn away from his wickedness" he "should be plucked as a fire-brand out of the fire." And the Bishop adds—"This I conceive is the true notion and representation of the eternity of rewards and punishments." After laboring to show that such changes may take place in the world to come, he adds:—

"Repentance, therefore, is not impossible in hell; but yet you may ask—What reason is there to think it possible? and I answer—Because it is impossible for any creature to live in eternal torments. Who among us can dwell with the devouring fire? who among us can dwell with everlasting burnings?.... Nothing can be more contrary to the divine nature and attributes, than for a God all-wise, all-powerful, all-good, all perfect, to bestow existence on any beings, whose destiny, he foresees and foreknows, must terminate in wretchedness and misery, without recovery or remedy, without respite or end.... 'God is love;' and he would rather have not given life, than render that life a torment and curse to all eternity.... Imagine a creature, nay, imagine numberless creatures produced out of nothing.... delivered over to torments of endless ages, without the least hope or possibility of relaxation or redemption. Imagine it you may, but you can never seriously believe it, nor reconcile it to God and goodness.... God.... could never make any [creature] whose end he foreknew would be misery everlasting .... The letter of Scripture may indeed sound forth everlasting punishments, but the Spirit of Scripture intimates the contrary.... The Lord proclaims himself, Exodus xxxiv. 6, 7, 'The Lord, the Lord God, merciful and gracious, long-suffering, and abundant in goodness and truth, keeping mercy for thousands, forgiving iniquity and transgression and sin;' but how can such attributes consist with a system of irrecoverable vengeance for thousands, transgressions never to be forgiven, and torments never to have an end?"

Thus Bishop Newton was driven into the doctrine of the final restoration of all men and devils, as the remainder of the article shows, from which we have made these few extracts. How came he plunged into Restorationism? Because he set out with the false theory that all men and devils are immortal, or have eternal conscious being: there was the foundation of his error. He has proved, in the first part of his article, conclusively, that the punishment of the wicked is eternal; he then has, virtually, to deny his own position on that ponit, as well as deny the plain Scripture testimony of the endless duration of the sinner's punishment: and why all this? Because he adopts the Papistical notion of "immortal souls," and makes the punishment of the wicked to consist in torment instead of death, as the Scriptures affirm; for, "The wages of sin is death:"—and that death is everlasting, eternal, for ever and ever—no recovery—no restoration.

The Bishop, to establish his point, has placed the righteous in a position that they may fall from glory, and thus come under the power of death, in direct contradiction of our Lord's plain words, that they who are accounted worthy to attain that world and the resurrection from the dead, can die no more. Luke xx. 35, 36. All that is the fruit of the common theory of endless being in undescribable torments. Man has no immortality in himself. Out of Christ he is dying: and he dies an eternal death, because he would not come to Christ that he might have life: he is consumed like the "fat of lambs; into smoke shall he consume away." See Psalms xxxvii. 20.

How long will men preach popish superstitions, instead of the plain testimony of the God of truth? They will do it till they cast off the traditions of men, and lay aside their "Standard Authors," which they are now deifying, and trust alone in the Lord's truth and Spirit to guide them. When they thus honor God, they may expect that he will honor them. But while they trust in man, they are "cursed" with blindness. Bishop Newton's entire article shows a powerful mind, in a mighty struggle to extricate itself from a dilemma into which it had been cast by adopting the notion that the soul, out of Christ, is immortal. He cannot deny but that the "letter of the Scriptures" plainly "declares" the sinner's punishment to be eternal; but then, having fixed upon a false theory as to what that punishment is, viz: eternal torments, he starts back with "the spirit of the Scriptures intimates the contrary." Thus setting the letter and the spirit of the Bible at war with themselves.

It is true, that while the Scriptures plainly declare that the punishment of the sinner is eternal, both the letter and the spirit of that blessed volume agree that the punishment of the sinner in not endless torment, in conscious being, but death. To this fact there is the most perfect harmony and agreement throughout the book of God. By not perceiving this truth, the great mind of the Bishop was swamped in confused and unscriptural notions of Restorationism. He had, however, more courage than many modern ministers of the gospel, who lean strongly towards that doctrine, but have not courage enough to avow the workings of their own minds, lest it should make them unpopular. We do know that some of the ministers of the present age, in the "orthodox" churches, are at heart Restorationists, but dare not own it, and, perhaps, denounce us for believing that "all the wicked will God destroy."

They have been driven and chafed in their minds by Universalists and Restorationists, till they no longer preach eternal torments in the strains they used to do, and are leaving their flocks to slide into Restorationism by insensible degrees, so that the "orthodox" churches are fast filling up with real infidelity, while their pastors occasionally denounce the true doctrine of the end of the wicked as "Destructionism," or "Annihilationism." Let them cry out still, if they will, or sleep, lie down, and love to slumber; the Judge of men will soon show by what principle we have all been actuated; and then shall every man receive according to his deeds—"To them who by patient continuance in well doing, seek for glory, and honor, and immortality, eternal life." But, if we have been ashamed of Christ, or his words, he will be ashamed of us in the day of his coming in his own glory and the glory of his Father, with the holy angels—then shall such "be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord," &c.

Justin Martyr, in his dialogue with Trypho, the Jew, affirms that, "at the time of Judgment, those souls that appear worthy of God, die no more, but the rest shall be punished as long as God shall please to continue their existence, and their punishment." This passage Bishop Newton quotes, as favoring his views of Restorationism. But, if he quotes the language correctly, it appears clearly to favor the idea of the final non-"existance" of the souls who are found wicked; but, whether it does or not, the Bible positively declares, "The soul that sinneth it shall die." And once in death, they are eternally "holden with the cords of their sins;" which sins are "the sting of death," and give death its binding power and eternal dominion; so that "the wrath of God abideth on them and they shall not see life." Ezek. xviii. 2, and John iii. 36.

THE WESTERN MISSION.—NO. 4.

FROM W. S. CAMPBELL.

Since my last I have been engaged in the the usual routine, and had but few incidents which would interest the friends in the East. I might note the opposition of all the sects to the Life doctrines. And the more ignorant, the more sectarian. I have intimated the position of those who, as Br. Lewis remarks, make "water baptism an insurance office," which, it must be granted, is an abuse of it.

I will now give you, with as little circumlocution as possible, the position of the Dunkards.

We rode from Otto to Lewistown, with one of their ministers, who is a very honest and consciencious man, but who had studied the gospel only through the spectacles which the sect had placed over his eyes. He had straightened his gospel till none could be saved by it who did not believe as he did; which, he declared, was to do as the gospel enjoined; and he could tell us just what that was, viz.: to be baptised, eat the Lord's supper, and wash feet. All faith, and all works aside from these would be in vain.

When told that he made these the whole ground of his justification, not faith; he did not hesitate to argue the virtue of specific acts as the true plan of acceptance with God. We urged that this was throwing the gospel entirely out of apostolic gear, insisting on carnal ordinances, (they become so, in such a light) and restoring an abrogated law, which in the injunction of works was shadowy and typical, pointing to the true and real, (Christ and faith). He was prompt to claim that the gospel is only another system of types and representations of good things to be made known.

We suggested the vast multitudes who believe the gospel, manifest its spirit, and obey its injunctions, in their line, who could never be brought to see things in such a light; and, as a consequence, could never be expected to act as he required, unless some few of them should turn hypocrites. But his reply only gave farther illustration of the force of prejudice; the effect of that kind of teaching and thinking which had formed his conceptions of the great plan of mercy. "It is plain," said he, "they can all see it, and if they will not comply they must be left." We had to leave him. It seems that he brings a ceremonial along with Christ, which can never be allowed. I do not judge him, nor any other who believes in any of these peculiarities. He is doubtless a Christian man; but I think the trouble with him, and very many others, is, the taking for granted the immortality of the soul. If we can ever convince the people that the word of God is the true and real testimony on this point, we shall have but little difficulty. There is no error more deleterious than this manifest heathen dogma of the innate immortality of man. This lies at the bottom of the great fabric of erroneous theology which men, ministers, and churches are raising, to the perversion of the true doctrine of man's future life.

Perhaps if our Advent brethren could fully appreciate the resort of the popular churches when pressed on the question of "life only in Christ," they would not so readily fly to the same covert when unable to answer our arguments, based upon their own mode of interpretation. We say that death is the penalty of sin. The advocate of the theory that man is possessed of an immortal soul, replies, that death does not mean extinction of being; but it has various significations—as temporal, spiritual, and eternal; and does not mean to die at all in the most important consequence of sin; but to suffer. The Adventist answers, "The death Penalty! What is it? Not temporal! for sinless infants and sanctified saints die a temporal death." This is specious to some minds—not to those who are disposed to take the simple and direct testimony of the Bible for their guide. By the way, this is the old corner stone argument for the future torment of man. But how came man to die, —these infants and righteous men? How came they in the state of death described so fully by St. Paul? who knew, probably, a little more of the question than our modern writers, who are compelled to ignore his most direct testimony, in raising men—the wicked —mortal; for they have the righteous raised mortal too, and consequently subjects of death But why did they die? They died in Adam. Was that a penalty? He begat a son in his own likeness! Now this condition passes upon all, "for that all have sinned." The death penalty, in the light of scripture, is upon all who live by the life principle which God gave to Adam; hence it was upon Christ himself, who knew no personal sin, must have been, that he might redeem us from the penalty; and he was as innocent as an infant or sanctified saint. The penalty, being then a condition upon all, all must suffer it as Adam did. Well, he went back to the dust of the ground from which he was taken. If that was the penalty inflicted upon him; if that is what death means, if men can understand this, and the word of God no where indicates a torment, after the "time" death, as the penalty; nor yet dying twice; which is the position foolishly taken by many upon the "second death" of the book of Revelation—a symbol of complete destruction—the lake of fire, in which five subjects that never ceased to exist before, are annihilated.

Death, in its own nature, is everlasting. A negative of life. You state that man is not to be blamed for Adam's transgression, but he is in a state of sin and death by it, and whose fault is that? Our Lord declares that "he that believeth not is condemned already." Unbelief is the great damning sin. "Light is come into the world and men have loved darkness rather than light." The whole secret is this, that men are in sin and death by their nature, and remain there by unbelief. They escape through Christ. "The wages of sin is death, but the gift of God is eternal Life through Jesus Christ our Lord"—not, in the first consequence, raising up men to kill them, by torment, after they were dead and were in the very state said to be the wages of sin; nor in the second, giving life to a class, who must obtain it by him, if they get it at all, (for he is "the resurrection and the life,") to kill them afterwards. This would be paying double wages to some whose death, without hope of recovery, has been the special result of the transgression of law.

Any condition that the divine Lawgiver chooses to make penal, is a positive infliction of punishment. He has declared that death, without any hope or prospect of escape from it, is the positive condition he will impose upon impenitent sinners. But, "Infants and righteous men die!" Yes; and infants and righteous men escape from death, through the righteousness of Christ which they receive; and justice is satisfied; acting in perfect harmony with mercy. The sinner does not escape. Therefore, he suffers the penalty—it is an everlasting punishment.

We are told that the sinner will never receive justice; which is to deny that God is just, and the justifier of the sinner who believes. We are told that Christ met the claims of the divine law and saved man from the Adamic death, which if it mean a death, the consequence of sin, is all the death the scriptures set forth; and now man is required to obey and be justified, just as Adam was; which, in the first place, is to set aside the light and grace of the gospel, and the special influences of the Holy Spirit; which it must be confessed many of these teachers are given to, to say nothing of the fate of their orthodox doctrine of depravity. In the second place, it is to teach universal salvation; for if Christ suffered death in our stead—offering an equivalent to the Father—what does he want of our suffering, or our death? Does he pay double wages this way?

What wonder is it that men believe in universal salvation; when so many find themselves necessitated to advocate the grand principle of universalism, on which their superstructure stands? Admitting the substitution of Christ for the sinner, in saving him from death, the only penalty God specifies in his word, the Universalist holds the entire ground.

But this plan goes farther; and by the effort to place Christ so fully in the position, leaves him entirely out; for it, as they constantly teach, does require works to justify under the pressure of the future torment motive, (be it longer or shorter, the principle is the same) which is but the heathen ground; the heathen, themselves, believing that the good would fare well at the hands of the gods, while the wicked would suffer terrors and tortures. Having left one side the doctrine of grace, as they do, in the work of man's regeneration, it is fitting that they should deny the real and revealed power of God in the salvation of his people—their resurrection from the dead. This they certainly do; for by their plan all men receive a resurrection precisely alike. Where then is the position of the righteous in that? and what becomes of his promise? They have taught the resurrection, as the promise of God to believers, and the hope of the Church. Now, in a mortal and corruptible state, what does it amount to?

When we hear men say that the death penalty is not that death which we suffer now, and that the resurrection of all men is to that same state of mortality which men had here—the state of death—we begin to think they have concluded the resurrection of the dead is of no great account. With them it is some fancied conditions that are important, which they think they discover by premises which are not drawn from the Bible.

God makes punishment loss. The loss of life. They make it torment. All the factions might then unite, and all again unite with the churches; for the great principle is the same.

Lewistown, Ills. July 1, 1865.

VALLEY OF ESDRAELON.

Ignorance of the geography of the Bible is a formidable barrier to understanding its history, or deriving the full benefit even of its moral lessons. The land of Palestine is so limited in extent that a few hours' faithful study can make one acquainted with its chief points of interest, but many Sunday school teachers, and even ministers, have little more intimate acquaintance with it than with the interior of Africa. The following brief sketch shows how much of the sacred narrative often centers round a single locality:

"The valley of Esdraelon is a fertile plain in the southern part of Galilee; the largest one in the whole country, it being thirty miles in length, twenty in breadth, and extending from the Mediterranean Sea and Mt. Carmel to the southern extremity of the sea of Galilee. It is surrounded by Mts. Carmel, Gilboa, and Tabor, and is watered by the river called by Deborah, 'that ancient river, the river Kishon.' This valley is noted for its battle-fields and encampment grounds. Here occurred the famous contest between Gideon, with his three hundred, and the army of Midian. At Megiddo, in this valley, Josiah was defeated by Pharaoh-necho. Here was Esdraelon, or Jezreel, a favorite abode of Ahab, where was Naboth's vineyard; and where Jezebel was killed, whose blood Hosea announced that God would avenge on the head of Jehu. In this plain was Shunem, where the Philistines met to oppose Saul, and from fear of whom he consulted the witch at Endor, also in this valley. Here was Nain, where Christ raised the widow's son. But the most memorable place in the valley of Esdraelon is Nazareth, where Mary dwelt at the time of the annunciation, where our Lord spent his life from the return from Egypt to the commencement f his ministry; where one day he entered the synagogue, opened the Scriptures, and read part of the sixty-first chapter of Isaiah, and spoke to the people; and where they took him to the brow of a hill to cast him down therefrom. On Carmel, which forms the western limit of the plain, Elijah and Elisha dwelt. On Gilboa, a mountain on the eastern extremity, Saul's army was marshaled previous to battle, and here Saul and three of his sons perished. There also arose in this plain Mt. Tabor, where Barak and his ten thousand encamped, and whence they issued forth to encounter and to defeat Sisera, tne commander of Jabin's army. Thus we have seen tnat the valley of Esdraelon has been the scene of numerous conflicts; and even in modern times, as late as 1799, Napoleon I. here defeated a body of Turks and Mamelukes; and travelers tell us that almost always at the present day this valley serves as the encampment ground of some wandering tribe of Arabs."

A Stand for the Right.—The following is foom D'Aubigne's History of the Reformation:

As Luther drew near the door that was about to admit him into the presence of his judges—the Diet of Worms—he met a valiant knight, the celebrated George of Freundsberg, who, four years later, at the head of his German lansquenets, bent the knee with his soldiers on the field of Pavia, and then charging to the left of the French army, drove it into the Ticino, and in a great measure, decided the captivity of the king of France. The old general, seeing Luther pass, tapped him on the shoulder, and shaking his head, blanched in many battles said, kindly, "Poor monk! poor monk! thou art now going to make a nobler stand than I or any other captain have ever made in the bloodiest of our battles. But if thy cause be just, and thou art sure of it, go forward in God's name, and fear nothing. God will not forsake thee." A noble tribute of respect paid by the courage of the sword to the courage of the mind. "He that ruleth his spirit is greater than he that taketh a city," were the words of a king.

Synopsis of News.

The great assassination plot which consummated in the hanging of four of the principal persons engaged in it, last Friday, will furnish an important chapter in the history of this nation. For the first few days of the trial every scrap of testimony which was not suppressed by the court, was eagerly sought for and read with interest by the public; but as the trial progressed the excitement abated, until finally but little attention was paid to it. Last Thursday, however, it was once more awaked to the subject, by the reception of the news that the President had approved the finding of the court, viz.:—Mrs. Surratt, Payne (Powell is his right name), Harold, and Atzerott to suffer death on the gallows; Dr. Mudd, O'Laughlin, and Arnold imprisonment for life, and Spangler for six years, all at hard labor in the Albany Penitentiary.

The execution of those condemned to death was witnessed by only about two hundred persons, and took place at Washington. Up to the last moment there was a general expectation that Mrs. Surratt would be reprieved or her sentence commuted; but all efforts put forth to this end proved ineffectual. At almost the last moment a writ of habeas corpus was petitioned for and obtained, but the President promptly, yet respectfully suspended its operation. Throughout the whole trial and up to the hearing of her sentence Mrs. Surratt preserved a cold and impassive demeanor; but after learning her fate she became quite weak and nervous. The prisoners spent most of the night previous to the execution with their respective spiritual advisers who were with them to the last, and none of them, excepting Payne, it is said, obtained any sound sleep, and he not until near morning.

At the gallows, with the exception of Payne, the condemned exhibited a want of courage and self possession, and apparently, in their mind, suffered intense agony. Payne, as well at the gallows as throughout the whole trial appeared to care for nothing or feel nothing, but was entirely unmoved. When his sentence was read to him he seemed neither surprised nor disappointed, but manifested the same indifference, and had he been pronounced "not guilty" it would probably have been all the same to him, and have taken it as a matter of course. He is the son of a Baptist minister in Florida, and is only twenty years of age. "Sin, when it is finished, bringeth forth death."

The latest intelligence from Washington informs us that owing to additional evidence, lately received by the Government, implicating the arch-traitor Davis as one of the instigators of the assassination scheme, it is highly probable that he will be put on trial for that crime, before a Military Commission.

On Friday last news reached us that the ship Wm. Nelson, with four hundred German emigrants on board, had been burned on the Banks of Newfoundland. The steamer Meteor, with forty of the crew and passengers on board, arrived at St. John on Friday; but the rest of the passengers, who had left in the ship's boats previous to the arrival of the Meteor at the scene of conflagration, have not been heard from since.

One of the most terrible tornadoes of which we have any record passed over Vernon Co., Wis., on Wednesday of week before last, destroying Viroqua, a village of one thousand inhabitants. The La Crosse Democrat thus describes the effects of the storm; and the accuracy of this description, says the Brooklyn Union, "is confirmed by the details, which are given with great minuteness in the local journals."

"Those who have not witnessed the scenes of devastation can form no idea of the terrible power of the whirlwind. The ground is torn as if ploughed. Huge rocks ten feet square were hurled a distance of forty rods. Dwellings were razed to the ground and hurled rods away. Huge oak trees were twisted from stumps like reeds. Timbers sixteen inches square and sixty feet long were hurled through the air as though they were feathers. The scene of desolation is beyond description. The ground over which the whirlwind passed looks as if a mighty stream of water had carried floodwood over it. Houses, outhouses, trees, shrubs, fences, &c., &c., were swept away as if God in anger had rubbed His hand over the spot. Houses were lifted a hundred feet into the air, horses were whisked off like swallows, rocks were broken down like dry bread."

About seventeen persons were killed, and one hundred more or less injured. Frank.

The Herald of Life.

NEW YORK, JULY 12, 1865.

NO IMMORTALITY NOR FUTURE LIFE, EXCEPT IN JESUS CHRIST ALONE, AND BY A RESURRECTION AT THE LAST DAY IF DEAD, OR A CHANGE IF ALIVE.

What is the Gospel?

It is the Good News of Life—Eternal Life to dying men. "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." This is the gospel proclamation. Men are dying, mortal, corruptible; the Son of God declared—"I am come that they might have life," &c. All men are perishing—dying—whether they have "sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression" or not: so saith Paul. From death they need redemption, and the gospel proclaims it; and proclaims it as the great end of Messiah's mission into the world; and, saith Jesus, "This is the condemnation, that men love darkness rather than light," &c.

Paul testifies, "If there had been a law given which would have given life, verily righteousness should have been by the law." Gal. iii. 21. All men, by natural generation, are animal, and under the government of the animal; or at best, the intellectual. The law of God discovers to them, when presented to their developed intellect, their unlikeness to God; and that developed intellect lays a foundation to present the claim on man for a conformity to God; but the law of itself brings him no help to conform to its requirements. The animal man, by the appliance of the law, finds that in him "dwelleth no good thing," though he is able to discover what the good is, and "to will is present with him; but how to perform that which is good he finds not;" Rom. vii. 18. The "law in his members" brings him "into captivity to the law of sin and death:" in other words, he finds no power in himself, as an animal being, or a mere intellectual one, to comply with the demands of the law: it shows him his defects, but brings him no power to obey. He may have the disposition:—"to will" may be "present with" him, and still he finds himself destitute of power: thus did Paul affirm in the text we just quoted. Where is man's guilt in such cases? It is in refusing the help God graciously offers; whether that aid was proffered under the twilight of the antediluvian world, the Patriarchal light, the Mosaic morn, or the Christian day-light. We hesitate not to say, that if no help was offered to man, from a source out of himself, to keep the law, no guilt could rest upon him for transgression more than any other animal. But God does not, and never did, command any man to keep the law without at the same time promising aid. If men refuse that aid, transgression is inevitable and unavoidable.

That God commands no impossibilities is true; but that Paul found it impossible to comply with the demands of the law, till he came to Christ, or embraced God's proffered help, he clearly states, Rom. 7th and 8th. When he embraced that help then he walked no longer "after the flesh but after the Spirit;" then "the righteousness of the law" was "fulfilled" in him, and the animal weakness was overcome by the Spirit's power. Henceforth he keeps his "body" [the animal] "under" and brings it "into subjection." 1 Cor. ix. 27. Now he proclaims—"I can do all things through Christ who strengtheneth me:" Phil. iv. 13. "For what the law could not do, in that it was weak through the flesh, God sending his own Son in the likeness of sinful flesh, and for sin condemned sin in the flesh, that the righteousness of the law might be fulfilled in us who walk not after the flesh but after the Spirit." Here is a clear statement of man's condition as an animal being: he could not, without God's aid by his Son and his Spirit, "fulfil the righteousness of the law;" but by that proffered aid he can comply with all God's requirements; and man's guilt is, that he refuses that aid: and "the wages of sin is death."

For God to offer aid to men to do that which they are perfectly able to accomplish without such assistance is to mock and insult them. But under every dispensation since Adam, so far as any revelation has been made, the dealings of God with men have been on Covenant grounds, in which man's want of power has been distinctly recognized, and God's offered aid as distinctly manifested. While God commanded the people to love him with all their heart, he as distinctly promised, saying, "The Lord thy God will circumcise thine heart, to love the Lord thy God," &c. But he further declares, "I will yet for all this be inquired of by the house of Israel, to do it for them." Compare Deut. xxx. 6, with Ezek. xxxvi. 26, 27, 37.

Almost innumerable instances, of the like recognition of the fact of the lack of power, unaided of God, are on record throughout the Old Testament.

The New Testament, or Covenant, is equally explicit; but one text is sufficient for the present. Saith "the faithful and true witness"—"Without me ye can do nothing:" John xv. 5. Here is not only a distinct recognition of man's inability but a clear statement of the true source of his help. Does man fail in his obedience to God, and is he guilty for that failure? Yes. But, why is he guilty? Because he refuses proffered aid—because he neglects to "lay hold on the hope" set before him by accepting the covenant of promise.

If God had not spoken unto men promising them aid to do his will, the law would have no condemning power, because the law found man without power, as an animal being, and brought him no help to do its demands. Its demands are holy, just, and good; manifesting the purity of God, and presenting man a model of character that is God-like; yet this manifestation would be mockery if grace, or the God of love and favor, did not at the same time bring help to man for his acceptance. That help is not forced upon man; but he is invited and urged to avail himself of it, and condemned if he refuses it. "If I had not come and spoken unto them they had not had sin," saith Jesus. He came telling them of God's love, and promising them God's Spirit, which "helpeth our infirmities," if they would believe on him whom God had sent. Under every dispensation men have been taught to ask God's aid; and many have sought it by prayer, &c. This fact shows that animal men—and such are all by natural generation—have not power, of themselves, but need it as a gift of God's favor or grace. In every age God has invited and encouraged men to seek his help.

So far, then, as guilt rests on man, it is not for his natural constitution and lack of power, or ability to conform to the law, but for rejecting God's offered mercy or aid: "This is the condemnation that light is come into the world, and men love darkness rather than light because their deeds are evil." It is not only their special aggravated condemnation, but it is "this" rejection of light, or aid, God has revealed for their help, which constitutes the condemnation: "this is the condemnation."

Definite Time of the Second Advent.

While some seem to feel it duty to fix on the exact time of the return of our Lord from heaven, and are laboring to obtain that knowledge, we are content to leave the time and the season for it in the Father's own power. If the discovery of the time could be made, we are quite sure it never can be by the supposition that the "70 weeks" of Dan. ix. terminate with the first advent, or within three and an half years after. Nothing is plainer to us than that the 70 weeks include all the time till "the holy city was given up to the Gentiles; or, to that time when Jerusalem was compassed about with armies. Our Lord commanded his disciples to "begin," their work "at Jerusalem;" and he never told them to leave it out of their labor till "ye shall see Jerusalem compassed about with armies;" then, and not before, terminated the "70 weeks determined upon thy people and thy holy city, to finish transgression." Then their iniquity was "filled up:" and then the "condemnation to the fire of Gehenna" came upon the city and people; and in the middle of one week, following the 70, the sacrifice and the whole Jewish ritual was made to cease, by the destruction of the temple and its services. Till the advocates of definite time abandon their premises, about the end of the 70 weeks, they labor in vain, even if there were no other reason why their labor is lost and useless.

We firmly believe the event is "nigh, even at the door;" but we have no idea of attempting to find out the exact day or year for its occurrence, and we think the propensity to do it tends to an intolerant spirit that ill becomes those who are looking for the advent. The leading advent paper (of Mr. Miller's school) said in March 1844.

"There are none of the prophetic periods, as we understand them, extending beyond the Jewish year 1843. The above we shall ever maintain as the immutable truth of the word of God, and therefore, till our Lord come, we shall ever look for his return as the next event in historical prophecy."

Yet the same paper made large professions of its wisdom in discovering that the tremendous events of 1848 were a wonderful fulfilment of prophecy, giving evidence that they had always been right in their theory: and they say, in 1849.

"We hail the emancipation of the sons of Abraham from their long, cruel, and ignominious political and religious bondage to the Gentile powers of earth, as another evidence of God's faithfulness in fulfiling his word," &c.,

Now what is all this but saying, indirectly, (for they never confessed directly) "We thought in 1844, there was no more historical prophecy to have a fulfilment prior to the advent, but great things have come to pass that we looked not for: nevertheless, we will turn these things to our account, and make the most of them to keep up the appearence of the truth of our theory."

After the "Jewish year" 1844 had passed away, one of the conductors of the paper of which we have spoken, held the following language in his Harmony of Prophetic Chronology, and Time of the Advent to be Known, in which he leaves the "Jewish year 1843" and stretches out the period to the end of 1847:"—

"Those who are brought to view as the subjects of the wrath of God at the Second Advent, are those who reject the testimony of God on the time of that event."

Yet, "the time" of this leader all failed; but his developments afterward painfully show that his uncharitableness, and that of his associates, had not failed. We have seen that these leaders were mistaken both in time and in events; and yet they severely denounced us for "not following" them.

After 1844 we looked for and expected to see the breaking in pieces of the monarchies of Europe before the advent; and were not taken by surprise when the French revolution of 1848, and the events following occurred. We believed before their occurrence, that such "historical prophecy," or prophetic events, would occur before the "return" of our Lord; and we think a still greater breaking in pieces is yet to occur before the actual advent of the Prince of Peace.

We believed then, and still believe that many "historical prophecies" are yet to have a fulfilment on this earth, before the "new heaven and new earth" of Rev. xxi; but how many of them are to be prior to the second advent, or personal return of our Lord, we do not know. Were we believers of the school above referred to—that is, believers in the theory that denies the return of the literal posterity of Jacob "to the land wherein their fathers have dwelt"—that maintains the burning of the whole globe at the precise time of the advent, immediately to be succeeded by the new heaven and new earth, and the ending of probation to all the human family, without regard to the unavoidable ignorance of many—we say, were we believers in such positions, we could not, with our present light, believe that the advent would occur for years to come, unless we were to account many of the prophecies as "cunningly devised fables."

Christ and the Penalty.

The fact that Christ suffered the penalty of sin appears to be questioned by some who believe in no future life out of Christ. They might as well question the Atonement itself. Was Peter mistaken in saying that Christ "his own self bare our sins in his own body on the tree"? Was John the Baptist mistaken when he said, "Behold the Lamb of God that beareth the sin of the world"? And was God himself mistaken in predicting the great fact through Isaiah the prophet? "He was wounded for our transgressions, he was bruised for our iniquities, the chastisement of our peace was upon him; and with his stripes we are healed....Yahveh hath laid on him the iniquity of us all....By the knowledge of him shall my righteous servant justify many, for he shall bear their iniquities....He was numbered with the transgressors; and he bare the sins of many, and made intercession for the transgressors." When these and other passages fade from the sacred pages, the assertion may pass muster that "the Bible nowhere teaches that Christ paid the penalty due to sin." "Christ died for our sins according to the Scriptures." Let us not think of denying this until we are ready to deny "that he rose again the third day according to the Scriptures," for the two facts are indissolubly linked. What God hath joined, let no man part.

An Exposition of Isaiah xxvi. 14, 19.

BY ELD. F. H. BURBANK.

My only apology for writing this article, is, that I have been called in question by brethren and sisters concerning my soundness in the faith of the Gospel. I admit that on the question of "the resurrection of the wicked" I have been unsettled for the last two years, and am still in doubt. Many declare in the most vehement manner, that "not a text can be found that teaches that any of the wicked shall not rise from the dead," and think that I am almost beside myself in declaring to the contrary. I do find texts that teach the opposite, and present for the consideration of all those brethren and sisters, a biblical exposition of Isa. xxvi. 14, 19.

First; read Isa. xxv. 6–9. "And in this mountain shall the Lord of Hosts make unto all people a feast of fat things, a feast of wine on the lees, of fat things full of marrow, of wines on the lees well refined. And he will destroy in this mountain the face of the covering cast over all people, and the vail that is spread over all nations. He will swallow up death in victory; and the Lord God will wipe away tears from off all faces; and the rebuke of his people shall he take away from off all the earth; for the Lord hath spoken it. And it shall be said in THAT day, Lo, this is our God; we have waited for him, and he will save us: this is the Lord: we have waited for him, we will be glad and rejoice in his salvation."

Now read in the next chapter, which is a continuation of the prophecy. "In THAT day shall this song be sung." If that song does or does not include the entire chapter, the conclusion will be the same. We will grant that it does. It is a fact, then, that this song is sung BEFORE the righteous are raised. Isa. xxvi. 1, 13, 14, 19. "In that day shall this song be sung....O Lord our God, other lords beside thee have had dominion over us: but by thee only will we make mention of thy name. (They are) dead, they shall not live; (they are) deceased, they shall not rise; THEREFORE hast thou visited and destroyed them, and made all their memory to perish.—Thy dead (men) shall live, (together with) my dead body shall they arise. Awake and sing," &c.

It is as plain as "two and two make four," that this song is not sung by saints after their resurrection, but will be sung by those who have not died. The song is, "Thy dead shall live." That is future. "Together with my dead body shall they arise." That is future. "Awake and sing, ye that dwell in dust." That certainly is addressed to dead saints, not to dead sinners.

It is equally as plain that the "lords" of verse 13th will not be raised from the dead. Of them it is said: "They are DEAD, they shall not live." If that is not strong enough, then "they are deceased, they shall not rise," is. Look at the contrast: "THY dead shall live, together with my dead body shall they ARISE." The one already "destroyed;" the others yet to "awake and sing."

An Exposition of Daniel xii. 2.

BY ELD. F. H. BURBANK.

"And many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame (and) everlasting contempt."

This text I present, together with its exposition, for the consideration of those who affirm that "there is not a text in the Bible that declares that all, or a portion of the wicked, shall not be raised from the dead."

The text before us is the second in number which I present as teaching to the contrary of what those brethren have declared. There is but one supplied word in the entire passage, the word "and" in the last sentence. Daniel declares that "many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake." If the text read; "Many that sleep in the dust of the earth," the assertion that "many" means "all," might hold good. Many sometimes means all, in the Scriptures, and sometimes it means a part. But "many OF" never meant the whole, but on the contrary means a part.

Examples Ex. xix. 21. "And the Lord said unto Moses, Go down, charge the people (all the children of Israel) lest they break through unto the Lord to gaze, and many of them perish." It is evident that whatever portion, of the people disobeyed the Lord's command, that portion, "many of," should perish. It is not to be presumed that all would "break through....to gaze" though many of them might.

2 Chron. xxx. 18. "For a multitude of the people, (even) many of Ephriam and Manasseh, Issachar and Zebulon, had not cleansed themselves, yet did they eat the passover," etc. "A multitude of the people," and "many of Ephriam," etc., have never been spoken of as meaning the whole of the people, or the whole of Ephraim, etc., but of a part of the whole.

Esther viii. 17. "And in every province, and in every city, whithersoever the king's commandment and his decree came, the Jews had joy and gladness, a feast and a good day. And many of the people of the land became Jews; for the fear of the Jews fell upon them." No one who is in possession of their reason would have the idea that many of meant that the entire population of the "one hundred and twenty-seven provinces" became Jews, but they would say at once that many of meant a portion of the whole. So in the text "Many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake." As "many OF," nowhere else in the Bible, or any other book means ALL, neither does it mean "all" in Daniel. xii. 2.

Some affirm that the resurrection of the righteous and wicked is taught or declared. Their statement is as follows, "many of them that sleep....shall awake, some of the many OF them that awake, to everlasting life, and some of the many OF them that awake, to shame and everlasting contempt." They will admit that "many of" means a part of the whole, and then declare that that part of the whole is divided into righteous and wicked. That exposition is not much of a help out of difficulty, for they can do nothing with the remaining part of the whole, than to pronounce "non-resurrection" upon them. Certain it is that the Lord will not act after such a fashion, in raising up a portion of the wicked and leaving the rest in the dust of the earth.

There is a plainer and simpler exposition. The words rendered "some" and "some," are more properly rendered "these" and "those." The text would read then, "And many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, these to everlasting life; and those (the unawakened) to shame and everlasting contempt."

Archbishop Whately says of this passage, "It may be observed, that it does not necessarily imply a resurrection of all men."—"Corruptions of Christianity," page 85.

Others. Prof. Stuart states that "there can be no doubt on the part of him who has made any considerable investigation of this matter, that the great mass of Jewish Rabbins have believed and taught the resurrection of the just in the day of the Messiah's development." They do not give any intimation of a resurrection of the unjust.

Prof. Whiting renders the words in Daniel. xii. 2, "these" and "those." Prof. Bush renders them "these" and "those."

To my mind the text teaches plainly the awaking of a part of the whole, and that part awakes to everlasting life; while those who do not awake, shall be to shame, and everlasting contempt," or "an abhorring unto all flesh." Yours, searching the Scriptures. —Philadelphia, July 5.

"The Sands of Time."---No. 2.

Next in order to the 6000-years fiction comes that of the 2520 years. The inventor of the latter, whoever he was, might have had considerable imagination, but his logic was of the most insignificant kind. To state the theory is to refute it. It has two legs, one planted on Lev. xxvi., the other on Dan. iv. King James' version, in both chapters, mentions "seven times." In the first case, the phrase relates to the punishment of disobedient Israel, and in the second, to the judgment of Nebuchadnezzar. Contralogical imagination sees a wonderful revelation here. It is this: The seven times are seven years, which are 2520 days, which are 2520 years. (Why not continue the process, and say that the years are centuries, or millenniums?) Thus by this unauthorized double transformation of years into days and days into years again, the conclusion is reached that the punishment of Israel lasts 2520 years, while in the same space "the times of the Gentiles,"—the duration of Gentile rule over Palestine, which rule began in Nebuchadnezzar the man type of all the Gentile powers—are filled up. The theory is then made serviceable by commencing the assumed prophetic (!) period at such a time in the past as to make it reach a year or two in the future—just far enough ahead to make a pretty hobby-horse for tricksters to ride, while honest dupes pay well for a sight at the show. (This last remark is not intended for all preachers of "time," but for certain well-known characters, "supposing that gain is godliness.")

Not to waste words, we will briefly show the meaning of the phrase in Leviticus and Daniel which is made the occasion of the foregoing theory. In Leviticus xxvi. there is no reference to time. If there were, the facts would even then be against time-theorists. In the fourteenth verse, God begins to declare what he will do to disobedient Israel. "If ye will not heaken unto me, and will not do all these commandments,....I also will do this unto you; I will even appoint over you terror, consumption, and the burning ague, that shall consume the eyes, and cause sorrow of heart: and ye shall sow your seed in vain, for your enemies shall eat it. And I will set my face against you, and ye shall be slain before your enemies: they that hate you shall reign over you; and ye shall flee when none pursueth you. And if ye will not yet for all this hearken unto me, then I will punish you seven times more for your sins." The time-theorists say—"I will punish you 2520 years more for your sins." Where will they get authority for the commencement? For let it be noticed that this "seven times punishment" was to be fulfilled upon Israel in their land—not out of it. Let God describe this seven times punishment. "I will break the pride of your power; and I will make your heaven as iron, and your earth as brass: and your strength shall be spent in vain: for your land shall not yield her increase, neither shall the trees of the land yield their fruits." Here is the Divine description of the seven times punishment; How does it tally with the 2520 years theory? Were the Israelites punished that length of time in their land?

But the next verse strikes a harder blow at the theory we oppose. "And if ye walk contrary unto me, and will not hearken unto me; I will bring seven times more plagues upon you according to your sins." What! another 2520 years? Then if the first ends in 1867, we have to wait 2520 years more, do we? But we have no need to invent an explanation, for this punishment is also described. "I will also send wild beasts among you, which shall rob you of your children, and destroy your cattle, and make you few in number; and your high ways shall be desolate." This second punishment also was to be fulfilled in the land—not out of it. If the children of Israel did not suffer 2520 years in their land, how much less did they suffer 5040 years?

If the second blow has not killed this groundless theory, here is another. The next verse says: "And if ye will not be reformed by me by these things, but will walk contrary unto me; then will I also walk contrary unto you, and will punish you yet seven times for your sins." A third 2520 years. And this also is in the land. This makes 7560 years of punishment in the land.

But there is still another. "And if ye will not for all this hearken unto me, but walk contrary unto me....I will chastise you seven times for your sins." It is in this fourth "seven" that Israel is banished out of the land. So that we are virtually asked to swallow this camel: God punished Israel 7560 years in the land, and then came another punishment of 2520 years—part of which was fulfilled in the land—the whole ending in 1866–8. Three quarters of the camel is in the land of Palestine and the other quarter stretches across the sea to America, where some persons stand with open mouths to swallow it.

We have said that there is no reference to time in the chapter. It is the degree of punishment that is spoken of, not the duration. One of the quoted verses demonstrates this, "I will bring seven times more plagues upon you." God said that if the Israelites sinned he would punish them; if they would not heed him he would add seven times more punishment; if they still continued rebellious, he would bring seven times more plagues; and he would continue to increase their punishment until they were scattered among the nations, and their land desolated. When we come to the original, the case is still plainer; for the word "times" is not in the Hebrew, which in the four cases is literally thus:

Verse 18. "I will add to punish you seven for your sins."

Verse 21. "I will add upon you seven plagues."

Verse 24. "I will punish you also seven for your sins."

Verse 28. "I will chastise you seven for your sins."

Is it not astonishing that so many sound minds should have been deceived by this baseless theory? The "seven times" of Leviticus had been repeated until it was accepted as one of the chief foundation stones. But a fair examination discovers only sand. We wonder if he who originated the theory announced "the sealed book of Leviticus opened"?

Let us now turn to Dan. iv. The "seven times" in this case are undoubted. They refer to duration—seven years. But there is no more reason to work the double change of years to days, and days to years again, in this case than in the other? We do not see the least evidence of any other fulfilment of Nebuchadnezzar's dream than that which was fulfilled in Nebuchadnezzar's life-time. Daniel interpreted the dream thus: "The tree that thou sawest....it is thou, O king [not Gentile rulers in general, but Nebuchadnezzar only] and whereas the king saw a watcher and an holy one come down from heaven, and saying, Hew the tree down, and destroy it; yet leave the stump of the roots thereof in the earth, even with a band of iron and brass, in the tender grass of the field....till seven times pass over him: this is the interpretation, O king....they shall drive thee from men, and thy dwelling shall be with the beasts of the field....and seven times shall pass over thee," &c. Let it be noticed that this is not the dream, to be interpreted at hap-hazard; it is the interpretation itself, which needs no interpretation. The whole was fulfilled in Nebuchadnezzr's life-time, in literal years. If we should admit anything typical in it, we should refer it to seven literal years in the future; but we are satisfied that it is not typical. As for the 2520 years, they are so many grains of sand.

Br. W. S. Campbell.

Br. Storrs:—Should you want a very short article for the inside of the next issue of our paper, please publish this note to let me say that I deem the remarks of Br. Campbell, in the 4th, 5th, and 6th paragraphs of his "Western Misssion" article "No. 2," as worthy of very careful consideration by all our friends who are in the least danger of losing sight of the Bible doctrine of justification by faith in Jesus Christ. In this connection I cheerfully bear witness to the deep interest which I always feel in the manner in which Br. Campbell puts the works and merits of our Divine Redeemer in the forefront of his preaching. Such discourses are always food to my poor heart, and it is my prayer that our brother's Missionary labors may feed many hungry souls on the prairies of the West. His letters to Headquarters are quite enjoyable, and I trust they will keep coming at the rate of about two per week. Yours in love.

"Because."

Br. Leonard C. Thorne, in his excellent letter in the last paper, closes one of his sentences thus: "and because we have that Spirit dwelling in us we too shall come forth triumphant over death and sing the victor's song." The whole sentence is an evident allusion to Romans viii. 11, and I wish to say, that "because of his Spirit that dwelleth in you" is a reading of that passage so well supported by MSS. that the best critics adopt it, among others the translators of the American Bible Union. For one, I habitually quote it according to this reading (while I also give the common one), and regard the alteration as overwhelming in its bearing against the revival of those in whom God's Spirit dwells not. Dr. Hodge remarks, that, according to the reading in question (because of instead of by), "the meaning is," "that the indwelling of his [God's] Spirit is the ground or reason why believers should not be left in the grave." Pretty good, that! Now, will somebody tell us what "ground or reason" there is why dead sinners "should not be left" unquickened?

Health of the President.—The health of Mr. Johnson has suffered from his intense application to business. It is said he has been outside the White House but twice since taking up his residence there. The consequence of such severe labor was a nervous prostration, from which he is now partially recovered, but which last week prevented the performance of any business, and put a stop to even the cbinet meetings.

From Mrs. Maria Mathews Weaver.

Compton, C. E., July 4, 1865.

Br. Storrs:—By husband's request I write you. He has been laboring here a while amid great prejudice. Some of our Advent Brethren were afraid to hear him preach; but by invitation of an unconverted man—a magistrate—he spoke to an intelligent audience on the "Life theme." Whether it be of God or not, the work went well. Many who heard are shaken in their faith, and ask each other, "What shall we do with his arguments?"

Among those that "believe" we reckon Eld. C. L. Percival, the man to whose arguments Br. Holt replied. He is a good man—educated, talented as a preacher, an excellent singer, and has "a good report from those that are without." But, like many good men, he is poor as to this world's good's. He wants the "Herald," but does not see a way to pay for it at present, so if you will send it to him, husband will pay for it when conveinent.

I think the subject of Life from the dead is an important one; yet we must remember the most important thing is to lead men to Christ, and persuading them to obey him. I have seen men converted to doctrines whose lives were not bettered. We are to "entreat, exhort, rebuke" as well as to "teach." Let us be careful how we labor.

And now one thing more and I have done. Let us be kind. I am saddened to read the harsh language of some of our writers in the various advent papers. Let us remember that aggrivating words will do more harm than good and spoil the influence of those that use them. This has been my fault as a writer; but it is time we all had our spirits softened, or renewed.

May the Lord help us to be faithful and so glorify Him. Your Sister in the Lord.

Note by the Editor.—We thank Br. and Sister Weaver for the subscribers and money sent; and we gladly send the Herald of Life to Br. Percival. May the Lord make your way prosperous in Canada.

From Helen Robertson.

Utica, N. Y., July 3, 1865.

Br. Storrs:—After an absence of nearly ten months, I find myself in Utica again, enjoying the society of my sister and family. Those formerly interested in the Advent and Life theme have mostly left; only Mr. and Mrs. Parks remain now. They still take the H. of L, and through them I see it. Yes, and it seems good to see it. When we are all together we don't appreciate it so much; but to those scattered, isolated ones, it is good to read the breathings of kindred spirits, and of those of like precious faith.

We are glad to notice that Br. W. S. Campbell has got to his mission field of labor. The difficulties by the way would make him enjoy the resting place more, just as the trials of this life will only make our eternal home the sweeter. O that we may be enabled to endure to the end, for only such will get the reward. Br. C. feels the need of prayer in his behalf, You shall have it Br. C. Your labors will be arduous, but we trust the harvest will be plentiful, and the resting place will be reached soon.

"We ask not our portion, we seek not our rest, Till we find them forever in Jesus' breast."

Yesterday afternoon, by special invitation, we attended meeting in a private house. The text was, "Whether therefore ye eat or drink or whatever ye do, do all to the glory of God." The character of God was very highly extolled, which we rejoiced to hear; but were exceedingly pained to hear the divinity of our ever precious Jesus, our only hope of a resurrection life, denied.

At the close of the meeting, each one round the room was asked to express his views, and we with the rest. O how glad I was to have an opportunity to vindicate the divine Sonship of my ever precious Saviour, Jesus; and show from the holy scriptures that there was none other name under heaven given among men whereby we can be saved but the name of Jesus. Take away his divinity and you take away the resurrection, hence all hope of a future life. Then everything real, substantial, and true is gone. But it is only a natural outgrowth of the fabulous immortal soul theory; for we found by after conversation that he believed the immortal soul got its resurrection at death, and the body lay in the dust forever. Thus the resurrection of Jesus was dispensed with.

He rejected much of the sacred Scriptures as spurious of course; and my great motive in writing this latter part is to say, let us hold on to the bible as a whole; and if there are passages that we don't understand, let us simply say so, and wait and pray for further light; but let us never reject any as spurious. And what is more, if we want to keep in the truth of the holy scriptures, which are able to make us wise unto salvation, let us study them diligently. Your sister in hope of future life through Jesus only.

Obituary.

Our highly esteemed friend Joseph Eaton, of Ohio, sent us the Delaware (Ohio) Gazette, in which we find a sermon preached on the occasion of the death of his daughter and her husband which gives the following statement:

Died—At Camp Chase, March 19th, 1865, Maj. Albert Longwell., M. D., Post Surgeon. Aged 34 years.

Died—In Delaware, at the residence of Hon. J. R., Hubbell, March 23d, 1865, Cordelia G. Eaton Longwell. Aged 28 years.

A distance of four days only separated the husband and the wife. They were stricken down at the post of duty, at noon of day and noon of life, and added to the number who have fallen in their country's service. They were both reared in an adjoining township, and were acquainted from childhood.

About 15 years ago Dr. Longwell came to Delaware. After some time passed as a student in the O. W. University, he made choice of his profession.

Nine years have passed since Delia, the only daughter and only surviving child of Joseph Eaton, Esq., became a pupil of the O. W. Female College. The father had marked out for her a generous culture—a thorough classical education. He met all her wants with a ready and liberal hand, hoping that soon she would be able to sit down by his side in the study of Greek and Hebrew, to which languages he had given considerable attention. Delia was an enthusiastic student, a faultless pupil, a model young woman. She was amiable, scholarly and christian. I can think of none more so since the founding of the College. She advanced to nearly the middle of her senior year.

In the meantime the Doctor had finished his studies, taken his degree and entered upon his profession in this city. He had added that other qualification preeminently needful to the medical profession—he became a christian, and united with the William Steet M. E. Church. In February 1859, the two were united in marriage. They were beautiful parallels in natural temperament and talent—in tastes, friendships and religious experiences—well suited to wear the conjugal yoke together.

Dr. Longwell is known among us as a man, highly honorable, as a friend reliable; as a physician, faithful and skillful. When the rebellion broke out he occupied a reputable place, and had attained to a lucrative practice. At the opening of the war he entered the army as Surgeon of the 4th Ohio Regiment, subsequently of the 88th Ohio; and for the last year was assigned to duty as Post Surgeon at Camp Chase, Ohio; where, taxed night and day in the care of sick and dying soldiers, he was attacked by malignant fever and died. His wife quickly followed. They sleep side by side in the cemetry of their native town. In his last hour the Doctor's thoughts wandered not from his post of duty. To himself he seemed passing from couch to couch ministering to the sick and dying.

The wife and mother, after commending her orphan boys to the fatherhood of God, is said to have given a most thrilling exhortation to the friends about her to remember and relieve the suffering soldier. In their motives and sacrifices may we not look upon them as martyrs fallen for the country, truly as the soldier that sleeps upon the field of battle?

There are many relatives present—members of the profession—a College—Church—fellow-citizens—the two little orphaned boys, did they but know their loss, would be the greatest mourners of us all.

Not a child or a flower dies but leaves behind a lesson—how much more the man who has deported himself well and taken part in a historic struggle that is without precedent or parallel in the annals of the world.

Died in Haverhill, June 13th, John Wesley, son of John Craig, of Westford, Mass., aged twenty-four years.

My thanks to the brethren and sisters of Haverhill for their kind aid and sympathy to me in my deep affliction.

John Craig.

The Colored People on the Fourth of July.

At a meeting of the "Colored National Monument Association," in Washington, D. C., July 4th, there were interesting speeches. The Oration for the occasion was by Wm. Howard Day, a colored young man of New York. The New York Herald's Correspondent says, he is a man of rare intelligence and good address;" and speaks of him as follows:

"He proceeded to depict the condition of the colored race in the past, his conduct in the late sanguinary contest which has ravaged the land, and claimed as a right the freedom which he had fought for and wrested on many a hard fought field from the unwilling grasp of the nation's foe and the former tyrant master of the slave. Let us, said he, remember the great motto, 'Right is of no sect, truth is of no color, God is the Father of us all.' This is what we are here for to-day—to recognize that principle, not united to do homage each other, but to the liberty which in the providence of God has been accorded to us after eighty-nine years of travel through the wilderness. We come to-day to the nation's capital—aye, to our capital—with new hopes, new prospects and new joys, as well to the future as to the past, and yet it is proper to say that we come with that joy tinged—aye permeated—with a deep sorrow which, nationally speaking, we have never known before. A little while ago, a few weeks since, all that was mortal of Abraham Lincoln was laid away to rest, and to-day after the funeral cortege has passed away—to-day when the muffled drums five hundred miles, aye two thousand miles long, in this vast procession has ceased to beat, still the sounds stalk through the chambers of our soul, and over the joy that overpowers us are shadows of his memory, which cause us to blend with our thanks and grateful praises sorrow for the great and good man who has passed away from among us, and to dedicate ourselves anew to the cause for which he lived so nobly and fell a sacrifice. Mr. Day gave a graphic account of the history of his liberty, and with a fluency of speech that showed he was master of the position. He ran over in his course Greek, Roman, Hebrew, Anglo-Saxon, Italian and Swiss, and glanced at the principles of the Pilgrim Fathers and the influence thereof on the destinies of the country. The present time, said the speaker, is not the first in which the prowess of the black man has been evinced. It was displayed in the Revolutionary war, in 1812 and '15, on many memorable occasions, and he has ever been earnest and faithful to the country. Liberty, said he, is not flesh and blood; it is immaterial as air. Chains cannot bind it nor dungeons inclose it. It is the principle underlying the Declaration of Independence. Since the black man was brought in one end of the country while the Pilgrim Fathers were bringing themselves in at the other, it is fitting and proper that they should meet here and march forward to freedom; for as yet the Pilgrim Fathers' idea is not on its feet. The Declaration of Independence is not yet fully carried out, nor will it be until in every corner of the land the black man as well as the white is permitted to enjoy all the franchises pertaining to citizens of the United States of America. In conclusion, said he, the ship of State has been ninety years careering over the billows, and in a devoted hour the thunderbolt sped and our mast was shattered. Thank God our ship was saved; but the cargo—slavery—has been tossed overboard to save it. Now we must raise a monument to the noble pilot who lost his life in attempting to get us through—a monument of learning, where the weary and worn may find rest and bury the honored scars gained in the glorious battle; where the former slave is secured, and, meeting the voices of the air and the murmurs of the sea, shall offer up prayers of gratitude to God for his blessed freedom, and for the Union, and for the prosperity which this nation is destined yet to attain."

Hon Henry Wilson, Senator from Mass., addressed the meeting. He said, I came here to meet freemen and to listen to words of humanity, of justice and of liberty; and I have listened to-day, as you have listened, to one of your own race; and I must say to you that, within the broad limits of the North American republic, there will be few speeches made superior to that addressed to you by him. Mr. Wilson gave an account of his first coming to Washington, thirty years ago; of the sales of slaves he had witnessed, the brutality of the treatment of the slaves and the despotism of the slave master; but, said he, I thank God slavery is dead and buried. Thank God for that. (Amen, and Cheers.) And I want to say to you to remember and carry it to your neighbor, and let it go from neighbor to neighbor across the continent, that the freedmen of the United States shall be protected in all their rights. (Immense cheering.) Slavery has robbed your cradles; it shall rob them no more. (Cheers.) It has had its auction blocks; the auction blocks are gone forever. It has had its bloodhounds; those bloodhounds shall be on the track of your race no more. (Loud and continued cheering.) Let the former slave masters understand this. Let every rebel in the country, from the Potomac to the Rio Grande, understand that their power and authority over the black man of this continent has passed away forever....I want them to understand that I belong to a body of men who are accustomed to sleep on the field of victory—a class of men who accept the doctrine of the New Testament, who accept, as the living faith of the North American republic, the Declaration of Independence—a class of men who represent the principles of liberty, of humanity, of justice, and a set of men who never can be defeated. (Cheers.) In our ears the words, the touching words, of Abraham Lincoln run forever that the black man may, in some hour of future trial, keep the jewel of liberty in the family of freedom.... I say to you that ninety-five out of every hundred of the men who in November last voted to put Abraham Lincoln—God bless his name—in the Presidential chair, are standing to-day shoulder to shoulder, determined to protect the freedmen of America. Nothing is more sublime than the record of the black man in this struggle. They have stood by our brave soldiers and sailors in the thickest fights; they have guided them against the enemy; they have stood by our men when fugitives from starving prisons and given them food. They stood by the country faithfully in the hour of trial, and the country will stand by them. ("Good, good!" and applause). ....I understand they [the rebels] say they hold the right of suffrage in their hands. I want them to understand that an act of Congress prohibits them from holding offices under the government, and until justice is done to the negro, those gentlemen will go minus the offices. Pardons won't give them to them. I am [not] in favor of compromises generally; but we may accept as a compromise justice to the negro. In conclusion, Mr. Wilson urged his hearers to temperance, industry and economy, to educate themselves and their children to be an ornament and a blessing to the country. And here I will say, in the broad light of noonday, that the Declaration of Independence read here to-day shall be the living faith and principle of united America. (Prolonged applause.)

After Mr. Wilson, Ex-Governor Hahn, of Louisiana, expressed the pleasure he felt at being present to participate in so interesting an occasion. He said the time used to be when it was said the negro was a brute, a descendant of the serpent, &c. He thought, from the remarks he heard and the intelligent looking faces he saw around him, that the negro had got to be considerable of a man.

Note by by Editor of Her. of Life.—Gov. Hahn's reference to the idea that the negro was "a descendant of the serpent" may not be understood by some of our readers. The fact is, a learned minister of Louisiana—a D. D, we think—wrote a work in defence of negro slavery, in which he seriously took the ground, that "the serpent" that tempted Eve "was a negro, and was Adam's Gardener." Hence the negro was another and inferior race, made to be slaves to the white men. But this D. D. forgot to tell us how this other race got through the flood, in the time of Noah, without being mentioned.

Responsibilities.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. He often differs from them; but believes in a free exchange of thoughts. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not: he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

Our Israelitish Origin.—A work on Prophecy. It was written by Prof. Wilson, England, some years since. We republished it, believing it could not fail to interest all thinking men, whatever might be thought of the accuracy of its positions. For ourself, we indorse the general theory that the Anglo-Saxons are the literal descendants of Israel, in the line of Joseph and Ephraim. Price, 50 cents, in paper covers only. Postage 6 cents.

Books.

Notwithstanding the greatly increased price of printing materials, the only change we make in our Catalogue of prices, is, to advance Bible vs. Tradition, bound, to $1: in paper cover, to 70 cents: and the amount to be pre-paid for postage, for the present, must be added on any work called for in our list of books and pamphlets. The Purchaser of books and pamphlets will understand that our Catalogue, as now revised in the Herald of Life, will be our guide in all cases of sale, and that all previous ones, whether in this paper or in any works of ours containing Catalogues, are hereby revoked.

All persons are welcome to work with us, even though they differ from us in their views on some points: but the Union, by the 2nd Article, intended to guard against being thwarted intheir design by votes of persons adverse to its object.—Ed. of Her.

Six Sermons on the inquiry, Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the Life-giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by Geo. Storrs; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This word contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in plain binding, 50 cents; in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near ten years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

The Watch Tower: or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead, can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none there fore fail to read this pamphlet.

Life from the Dead; or, The Righteous only will live again. By Geo. Storrs. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

Life only in Christ.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Editor of the Herald of Life. Price, $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

Man's Destiny.—Immortality: The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev, T. M. Post, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by Geo. Storrs. Price in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a Prize Essay on Immortality, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men, with ut egard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The Reviewer followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The Author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

Bible vs. Tradition: in which the True Teaching of the Bible is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity Life, Death, &c. Price, bound, $1. Postage 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. It is a work of much labor and research. The title indicates its object, and the performance shows the object was kept in view throughout. The language is sometimes severe on what is called "orthodoxy—more so than is desirable—but the value of the work, in general, cannot be over-estimated. Thousands of it have been sent abroad, and thousand more ought to be scattered. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subjects; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

GRANDPA'S STORY.

We gathered around the good man's chair,
When wearied with play were we,
Charley and Robby, and Will McNair,
Annie and Gracie, and Nell were there,
With Jessie, the pet of the curling hair,
Who climbed upon grandpa's knee.

"Tell us a story, please, grandpa, do,"
Said Annie behind his chair;
"Something wonderful, something new,
And I'll braid your hair in a Chinese queue,"
"But let the story be all—all true,"
Said Charlie and Will McNair.

Dear grandpa's brow had the amber glow
Of Indian summer time,
Ere sands of life in the glass run low;
Ere darkness comes, with the winter snow,
Or glad ear catches the murmur low,
That tells of a brighter clime.

He told the tale that should all hearts move,
Of the Lord of life and light—
How he left his shining home above,
To save the lost by his wondrous love,
How the Spirit came as a holy dove,
With her wings of spotless white;

Of the prayers that hallowed Mount Olivet,
When the storm-king lashed the surge,
And plowed the barque with her torn sails wet,
The wrathful breast of Genesaret,
And star of hope in the heart had set,
While the wild winds shrieked a dirge;

Of the form that walked the waves at will,
As erst 'neath the olive shade,
And the gentle whisper, "Peace, be still,"
Sent thrill of joy, and of fear, a thrill,
Till sweeter echoes the rapt soul fill,
"It is I, be not afraid."

He told how the worn feet paused at last
On Calvary's awful brow;
Of scoff and jeer, at the sinless cast—
How heaven and earth looked on aghast,
How rayless night o'er the vision passed,
That the spirit pictures now.

A solemn hush o'er our young hearts fell
As the death-scene rose to view;
We lingered long 'neath the hallowed spell,
"For the dear Lord's sake who loved so well,
Dear children trust that the tale I tell
Is a truth—He died for you."

BEN'S STORY:

THE GOOD A LITTLE MATCH MAY DO.

A little bright-faced boy had just touched a match to the kindling wood of the grate, and was watching the flame as it forced its way among the crackling coals, when half in thought and half aloud he said, "Who would think a little match would make so big a fire?"

"Ah! yes my little man," said his father, "a little match, like other little things, may do great good, or great harm." A good apostle once said, "Behold how great a matter a little fire kindleth!" And now as our fire is burning, I will tell you a story about a little match and the good that it did.

Away down on the shore of Long Island, stands a small house or fisherman's cabin. It is just far enough from the water to be out of the reach of the great waves, that come rolling in from the ocean, and near it is a little river in which the fisherman used to shelter his boat. At the time of my story the man had left his little cabin and gone to another place. It was desolate and dreary about that little heuse. You could hear only the moan of the surf as it broke on the beach, and sometimes the cry of those beautiful sea birds—the gulls—as they settled down on the water or made long circling flights around the mouth of the little river.

It was now the cold month of December; a strong wind had been blowing for three days, and all who thought of the sailor on that lonely coast, prayed God to keep him from its dangers. A good brig, that is, a two masted vessel with square sails, had, two weeks before, left the island of Cuba, bound for Boston. She had a captain, mate, and six sailors for the crew. Their voyage had been a pleasant one, and was about over. They were thinking of their homes and friends when the fierce storm came and drove them from their course. The rigging was soon stiff with ice, and it was hard to handle the ropes, or manage the ship. Officers and men did their duty as all true American sailors will do; but it was in vain. The winds and the waves and the bitter cold were too strong for the brave sailors, and carried the poor brig steadily towards the shore. Soon they heard a sound terrible to seamen. It was the noise of the breakers. The captain called all the hands about him and raised his voice in prayer. He prayed for their safety, if God so willed it, that they might have strength to meet the fierce waves, and if they could not be saved from shipreck, they might be safe in the mercy of God.

The brig soon struck, and she lay with her side to the shore, the water for a little space was so calm that the small boat was safely launched and every man seated in it. But, alas! before they could reach the shore, a great wave struck the little boat, and the poor men were cast into the boiling sea. Four of them with the captain reached the land, and though hardly able to move, dragged themselves forward to find a shelter. With a shout they came in sight of the little cabin, but alas! there was a creek between it and them. "We must go through, or die," said the captain; and after a great struggle they reached the other side, but the brave captain could go no further. "Leave me, my men," said he, "get help for yourselves, and then come back if you can." The men gained the house, but what horror seized them when they found it empty? One man only took heart as he looked at the fireplace and the wood near it. But alas! there was neither flint or steel to strike a light. A moment he stood in agony—but as he raised his head he saw upon the rude mantle a small box marked "matches." With trembling haste he seized it and found one single little match. Oh! how much depended upon that little match. Here were four sailors—a little way off lay their captain. All their lives were in that single match. If it failed, all must die, for cold and hunger were fast doing their work upon the poor men. With a trembling hand and a silent prayer, he drew the match, and as the little feeble flame broke out, "Thank God," burst from their praying lips.

That little match was life and safety to the poor sailors—but the good captain was beyond all help. He died before they could reach him. Remember how much one little match may do.

GOOD FOR THE EYES.

There was a long hill to climb, and Maggie, standing at the foot of it and looking up the sandy road thought of the sun-burning, and weariness she should experience before reaching the summit, but she knew that when she once stood there and looked down the hill on the opposite side, she should see the little brown cottage where Annie lived, and that consideration encouraged her heart. The burning rays of the mid-summer sun heated the stony road, but Maggie walked resolutely on, seeking the cool grass where she could find any, but trying the road again, when the rocks and ditches each side prevented her progress.

Friends were prizes in that lonely place, and there had been three weeks since she had seen Annie; what then was heat, or what were long hills, compared with the privilege of a visit to her again? Usually they met once a week, and then they had plenty to tell each other, but now that three whole weeks had passed, she thought they should never be done talking. She little knew that one short sentence she then should hear would become a life-lesson for her, whose hidden meaning would reveal new features of beauty as she passed the dusty road of life.

When the half mile was passed, and she stood at the door of the cottage, she pushed back her cape bonnet, wiped the perspiration from her face, and gave a gentle rap on the unpainted panels. She soon heard a step coming, the latch clicked, and as the door opened, a motherly woman stood before her.

"Why Maggie, child," said she, extending both hands to greet her, "the sight of you is good for the eyes."

How Maggie's heart thrilled in response. The words were so cordial in welcome, so outbursting with gladness, and so evidently genuine in sincerity, that the weariness of the hot road was instantly forgotten, and so great was Maggie's happiness, that she could never tell what she said in reply. She could only remember the kind woman's greeting, she was not sure that she replied at all; but she felt the smile that rose to her lips and eyes, and she remembered the sweet delight of being so certain of welcome.

Twilight was deepening its shadows, when Maggie retraced her steps that evening, but no shadow rested on her heart. An afternoon with Annie was always delightful, but this day there had brooded over her thoughts, those peculiar, welcoming words. If Mrs. Chase had said, "I am very happy to see you," the expression would have passed unnoticed: but to be "good for the eyes" implied more than the ordinary pleasure of receiving friends.

"Oh mother," said she, as she entered her home, "you cannot think what Mrs. Chase said to me. She said 'the sight of me was good for the eyes.' Wasn't it nice?"

"It is certainly pleasant to have our friends like us," said her mother, "and if you are pleased with being 'good for the eyes,' you must try to live so as to be always a blessing to people, and then the sight of you will be sure to give them happiness."

"I certainly will try," she thought, "I certainly will try to be good, and faithful, and true. How pleasant it is to know that our friends are glad to see us. I will try to have everybody love me."

With this resolution, Maggie bade good night to the outer world, and sought the pleasant country of dreams, but she did not forget the lesson she had learned. When the birds sang in the morning, she thought it over, and determined to begin that morning, and see if she couldn't be "good for the eyes."

Her mother and brother were surprised at the eagerness with which she offered her assistance in whatever they were doing, and her face was so bright and cheerful that her father told her she "looked like a sunbeam, and it was charming to see her."

Then Maggie thought how cheap were kind words. Mrs. Chase had used them, and her father had used them, and they had made her happy, and she hoped she should always remember to speak kindly. "If I do," she said to herself, "every one will be glad to see me, and say I am 'good for the eyes.'"

Maggie did not always live on that hillside farm. When she was old enough, she went away to school, and then she became a teacher herself, but wherever she went she carried her resolution to be "good for the eyes." The poor blessed her when she entered their doors, and she rejoiced that she was welcome in their homes.

The sick loved to see her at their bedsides, for her kindness made her the light of their eyes. The unfortunate sought her sympathy, and the joyful turned not away. The old loved her, adn the young followed her steps.

"It is all because I have tried to be pleasant to the eyes," she said one day. "It is beautiful to know that friends love to see us, and delightful to know that the sight of us is refreshing to them. It makes a heaven below, and when we reach the kingdom of God, everything will be beautiful to see. Kindness and love will be everywhere there, and all the inhabitants will forever feast on that which is glorious, and will be a beauty and delight for each other's eyes."—Selected.

IMMORTALITY.

The following article by Br. J. W. CRABTRE was written in the summer of 1863, a few months previous to his death. He died a victim of the rebel system of starvation in Southern prisons.—ED.

There seems to be some question with a certain class of believers in the resurrection, as to when immortality is experienced by the saints. I judge that the difficulty of settling this question does not arise from any seeming contradiction of Scriptural passages, nor from any lack on the part of our Saviour or the Apostles to make the subject clear, but from a neglect on the part of such persons to observe the harmony of law. I well remember a preacher, who, after hearing a discourse on the resurrection, was asked what he thought of that argument. He replied, that he thought the argument good enough, and the man's philosophy was well enough, "but then" said he, "his conclusions are not scriptural." Here was a frank acknowledgement that his views were opposed to good argument and to sound philosophy.

Philosophy is simply knowledge, or an explanation of the reasons of things, whether, natural, moral or mental. To reason philosophically is to argue rationally or wisely. Those who suppose natural laws to be opposed to scripture, are forgetful that God is the author of both. If we construct a building of wood, natural laws tell us the building when finished, will be wood. If we employ many kinds of material in constructing another house, it nevertheless will be a house, but philosophically, that is in nature, different. In all departments of nature this law of construction is true. Things partake of the nature of that from which they are formed. The Apostle says: 1 Cor. xv. 53, "For this corruptible shall put on incorruption, and this mortal shall put on immortality." Now we ask, does corruptible bear a corresponding relation to the principles known to exist in the material from which it was formed? If we see any object whether animate or inanimate that was formed of purely corruptible material, who would stop to inquire whether the object was mortal and could retain its imagery only for a time? The natural laws tell every reasonable mind that whatever is organized of earthly material is corruptible.

The trouble with such persons as we first mentioned, is not so much in organization, as it is in organized bodies after life is added. It would seem that if we wished to determine what difference the addition of life had made, we should first ascertain the nature of that from which life is derived. If there is any harmony in natural laws, then the life added will be of the same nature as that from which it was derived. Two things are evidently true. First, when there is no organization there can be no vital life. Secondly, vital life cannot continue beyond the destruction of the organism.

If these statements are true, then the organization and the life must be of the same nature in order to perpetuate an existence. The Apostle has plainly established this natural law in 1 Cor. xv. 50. "Neither doth corruption inherit incorruption." Some may say the apostle only establishes the manner in which incorruption is gained, viz: by inheritance. The manner in which it is gotten does not change the fact that there must be a harmony in the nature of the body and life. I think none will say that the bodies of all human nature are not mortal and perishable. Then I ask, are there any who will say that the source from which all human and animal organization receives life, is not mortal? It is true that God is the author of our organism and of our life; but then, did He in establishing us, use laws that govern his own nature, or did he use material and laws that compose and govern all external nature? In other words, are our life and organism derived directly from God or from the earth and natural laws?

The life of one person may exceed that of another, but it does not prove they are not both of the same nature. It only proves that the natural laws were more perfectly established or regarded in one than in the other. Now if you regard the harmony of laws in the creation of man, let us also regard the divine law in re-creation. Some will say that all mankind are to be re-organized. Then it follws, in their theory, that all will be vitalized or receive life. But before any stumble upon such a conclusion as this, they should remember, first, the power and limits of the present law of organized bodies. Secondly, the source, from which our present life is derived; and thirdly, the limits that are placed upon the law of human life. If these things are kept in view, all can see the harmony there now exists between our organism and the law that causes life to flow through it, and that it is life that keeps our bodies in existence. God in his wisdom and mercy has made them to run parallel. Can we suppose that in the resurrection, or re-organized state, there will be an utter disregard of harmony and law? The duration of all who are re-organized will depend wholly upon the nature of that from which they receive their life. It is true we cannot tell all the principles of re-organization,—we cannot tell as plainly how the body shall be constructed, as we can tell of the present order of things; still, the apostle has told us that although we cannot tell precisely what we shall be, yet we know that we shall be like him from whom we receive our life. Here then, is our proof that re-organized bodies partake of the nature of Him who only hath the power to re-organize decomposed man. The apostle Paul says the resurrection shall be conducted with order. See 1 Cor. xv. 23. If there is order then there is law.

In the creation the source of life was established in our own organization and the external surroundings. These both being corruptible in themselves, we could not, in the nature of things, be otherwise. The fashion of the external world passes away and we pass with it. In the re-creation or resurrection, the source of life is Jesus Christ. When once we determine that the source of that life is eternal in nature and duration, and that the external world and all that appertains to it is imperishable and changes not, then we have forever determined the nature and duration of all who are re-created. Some will say, "This is all philosophy." Well, let us see how it will harmonize with the apostle's argument concerning the creation, and re-creation.

He says, "The first man was of the earth," and that all such are earthy, or perishable. He was one having a natural body, subject to weakness, dishonor,—and lacking glory. He lived as such, died as such, and was sown as such. See 1 Cor. xv. 36–50. But the apostle does not leave us in doubt as to the nature of the bodies of those raised or re-organized. He tells us of the second man, the first one in the order of the re-creation. He tells that those who have borne the image of the first man, may also bear the image of the second man, the Lord from Heaven. Question. Has he told us how we may ever bear the image of the first man the second time?

Hear him tell of the nature of those who are raised. They shall have bodies bearing the image of the heavenly;—glorified bodies; bodies incorruptible; filled with power; spiritual bodies. This then is the plain answer to a question in verse 35. The above determines the nature of the bodies of those raised, or re-organized; but what of the nature of the life received through the re-creation, or Him who is the resurrection? We have said that the harmony of law demanded that the organization and the life be of the same duration. God has determined the duration of this present life. He has set us bounds and we cannot pass them. Bounds are formed in the nature of our organism and in the source of our life. He who alone hath the power to re-organize decomposed man, has determined the duration of the life of those who are raised from the dead.

Hear him; and if we refuse to hear Him, we shall be destroyed from among the people. "But they which shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world, and the resurrection from the dead, neither marry or are given in marriage, neither can they die any more, for they are equal unto the angels, and are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection."

Here we find six important facts. First, the world to come and the resurrection are gained by a worthiness. Second, in that world none marry. Third, those who are worthy of that world and the resurrection die no more. Fourth, the reason why they die no more is because their nature is like that of the angels. Fifth, all such are the children of God. Sixth, the reason why they are the children of God is because they are the children of the resurrection.

Some, who will regard no harmony of law, neither the use of language, will say, this passage is not proof that some may not gain a resurrection and still not obtain that world. It reads, "that world and the resurrection." I think I am right in saying the and as a conjunction connects the two things gained and and shows the relation between them, and that there would be no harmony in the statement if it were possible for a person to experience the resurrection and not be a child of the resurrection; and if a child, then he can die no more according to this passage. The very fact of one being raised from the dead, is proof that he is a child of the resurrection; if a child of the resurrection, then a child of God; if a child of God—equal to the angels; and such can die no more.

Determine the nature of the angels and you determine the nature of those raised from the dead. Heb. ii. 16. "For verily he took not on him the nature of angels; but he took on him the seed of Abraham." Question. Why did he not take on him the nature of angels? —Evidently because he could not have died. But the seed of Abraham die. Here we see the nature that Christ bore as the Son of man, and the nature he bore by being the first fruits in the order of the resurrection. We realize plainly the nature we now wear. We have determined by the Saviour's words the nature all shall wear, who shall be accounted worthy of the resurrection. As he is, so shall those be, who are raised by him. "We shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is." "It is sown a natural body, it is raised a spiritual body. It is sown in weakness, it is raised in power. It is sown in corruption; it is raised in incorruption." Here, then, the children partake of their nature at the time of their birth; and these are born not of corruptible seed, and receive their life through him who has said, "neither can they die any more."

IN the kingdom of heaven all God's servants will be abundantly satisfied with His dealings and dispensations with them; and shall see how all conducted, like so many winds, to bring them to their glory and how even the roughest blasts helped to bring them homeward.

NAPOLEON III. AND OUR SILVER MINES.

Bishop Simpson delivered a sermon in Chicago on the National Thanksgiving Day, 1863. He said he believed that the battle of Gettysburg saved us from French interference; that no living man better understands the condition of our southern borders, Mexico, Central America, and our Western coast, than does the Emperor of the French. When he (the Bishop) had occasion, some nine years ago, to visit California and Oregon, on seeking for a geography and description of the country, and particularly of the gold regions, the best he could find was from the pen of Napoleon, written before he came to the throne; "and from that time on," said the Bishop, "I have been of the opinion that, when the right time comes, Napoleon would be found interfering with Mexico." We quote the remainder of the Bishop's statements on this topic:

"While in California, last fall, I thought I would visit the territory of Nevada, to see something of the wealth of that country, and I was there surprised to find the best papers written on the subject of the resources and wealth of Nevada, were from the pen of the agent of Louis Napoleon. I saw again the footsteps of the French Emperor there, and thought he was looking to see what degree of wealth could be found in case these United States should in time be dissolved. That wealth comprises that which the nations of the world never yet have contended for. Were the debt of our nation to amount to 20,000,000,000 of dollars, there is wealth enough when our debt is paid off to give to every soldier who returns from our battle-fields, muskets of silver in place of iron, and when our iron-clads come back from the scenes of victory before Charleston and Mobile, and have swept away the defences of Wilmington—when the iron-clads come back into our harbor, there shall be silver enough left to plate those boats more heavily than now they are plated with iron.

"I do not now speak from idle speculation, but I speak of that wealth from observation and actual calculation. When in California I visited the mines, and I thought the time would come when they would be exhausted; but in the mines of Nevada there are no such indications visible. The more the mines are worked the richer they yield. The extent of the ledges containing the precious metals no man has yet been able to measure. I will mention a single instance to give you some idea of the inexhaustible supply. In what is termed the Ophir mine, a single lead, as it is called there, is fifty-five feet in thickness, and inclines only at an angle of five degrees. Think of the extent of that, nearly as far as from this altar to yon wall. This is all silver mingled with gold. There is more gold in value than silver, but more silver in weight than gold. The company have only two hundred feet working, and out of that they are now realizing about ten thousand dollars a day. There is this peculiarity about it, that the deeper the mine extends the richer and more profitable it becomes. When I was there they had penetrated two hundred feet. There were five chambers which they had dug out, one under the other, leaving large pillars to support the roof. They would sink a shaft down about forty feet, make another platform, dig out the metal, leaving pillars as before, and then sink another. One of the directors told me that each lower platform gave as much yield as all the other platforms above combined; that is, the fifth platform was as valuable in its yield as the four above it put together. Such wealth never was a matter of contest among all the powers of earth before."

EMANCIPATION.

"The slaves are not the only women whom the war has emancipated!" was the remark of one of those women who have thrown themselves vitally into their country's service, and done on battle-field and in the hospital as faithful work as the soldier who has thurst himself into the breach, and fought at the front; women who have watched over the sick, and nursed the wounded, and dressed noisome sores, and shrank from no burdens, nor ministrations, however hard or revolting; women who have gone home from the camp and the hospital to tell the soldier's story in their own way, and to organize societies, and stimulate fairs, and to direct all spasmodic and uninformed activities into orderly and available channels of relief and succor.

"There has been an emancipation," said this woman, "from fashion and frivolity, from luxurious drawing-rooms, from lives of indolence, and pleasure, and self-seeking, from pettiness and weakness into activity and generosity, into courage and heroism, into inspiration, and endeavor, and self-sacrifice. The women, as well as the slaves, have had their emancipation through this war."

And now, women of North America, it remains with you to prove whether this emancipation is a vital and lasting one—not inspired by an hour which quickened all the sympathies, and energies, and heroisms of your sex, and from which you will shrink back into the old life and the old thraldoms. One thing is certain, the future of our country belongs to you; it will be what you make it!

Every day that I live I am more strongly impressed with the range and the power of woman's influence for good or for evil in the world. She who rules the homes of the land shapes its moral character. There is no getting aside of it. No man can get beyond the power of some woman's influence, be that woman dead or alive. There is no ridding yourselves of these vast responsibilities. They lie at your door, they rest on your head and heart, oh, woman! Rise then, "equal to the sublime occasion." Be worthy of your country, and of the demand which now she makes of every one of you. Let your emancipation be of the heart and soul. From all the old habits and tendencies which lead to weakness and wrong; from self-indulgence, from pettinesses, from little gnawing suspicions. and envies, and jealousies, from prejudice and narrowness—above all, from gossip, and the uncharity and mischiefs which it breeds, emancipate yourselves. Let your neighbors' affairs be as sacred from your tongue, as the purse in the drawer is from your finfiers.

Make it a solemn purpose to elevate the social tone of your own circle, whether that be high or humble.

If you drop in to pass an hour with a neighbor, see that the conversation runs into healthful channels, away from all unprofitable and silly talk, and when you come away, carry with you the pleasant consciousness that you have stimulated some good in your friend, that you have spoken some words that will perhaps be remembered for good, that you have softened some prejudice, or comforted some grief, or quickened some purpose, in short that your visit has not run to waste, or to scandal, which is wickedness.

Why cannot every mother in the land be a true, noble, large, generous-souled woman? This is better than any amount of culture or accomplishments, although I would not underrate these latter, but I would vastly sooner trust the welfare of our dear old country to a President whose mother was a true-hearted, God-loving, tender-souled woman, than to another man whose mother might have had gifts, and culture, to adorn any court in the world, without those inward graces which are above all price. I think this country owes to Abraham Lincoln a debt of incalculable magnitude, but perhaps she owes quite as much, after all, to that old mother whose life was set in such humble by-ways, and who has slept so many years in that lowly grave to which she went down, never dreaming what she had given and done to the world.

And, oh mother, for whom I write, these boys and girls—rude, troublesome, vociferous who are growing up around you, are taking day by day the impress of their characters from you. They will be what you make them. Every word that you speak, every example that you set, sinks into their souls, and will be repeated whether you know it or not.

On these boys and girls rests the integrity and honor of our country. They will be men in a little while, standing at the very helm of the nation, it may be guarding her honor, making her laws—they will be women in a few years, the wives and the mothers, it may be, of the rulers of the land.

Tread softly, deal carefully. Weigh well your counsels. You know not for what times or generations you are working. Above all things else, see that you lay in the souls of your children a good foundation in a love for the truth, deeper than the love of life itself. This is the basis of all character worth possessing. See to it then, that integrity is so firm that no storms can prevail against it, so deep that no temptations can eat into and destroy it; and in all this remember, oh, faithful mother, that your help is to come from, and your springs to be in the Lord God, who made heaven and earth.—Arthur's Home Magazine for July.

THE BIBLE.—It is incredible to any one who has not made the experiment, what proficiency may be made in that knowledge which maketh wise unto salvation, by studying the Scriptures by parallel passages, without any other commentary or exposition than what the different parts of the sacred volume mutually furnish for each other. Let the most unlearned Christian study in this manner; let him never cease to pray for the illumination of that Spirit by which these books were dictated and no argument of the perverse will of man shall be able to shake this learned Christian faith.—Bishop Horsley.

FUTURE RETRIBUTION.

Last week we gave our readers an extract from Bishop Newton's Works, showing the struggle of a powerful and pious mind, manacled by the theory of inherent immortality, to rid itself of the terrible consequences growing out of that theory, in view of the Bible announcement of eternal punishment. The following remarks of Prof. STUART, some years since, in the Biblical Repository, shows how another powerful and pious mind labored in endeavoring to reconcile hopeless torment with the perfections of God or the felicity of the saints in glory. He says:

"That the subject is one of fearful interest, none will deny who believe in future retribution. That there are difficulties pressed by it upon the mind, when one thinks of his own condition, that of his beloved friends, or of his brethren of the human race, it would be mere pretence to deny. But it is a consolation to believe, that behind any clouds, however dark, that interpose between us and the light of the sun, his beams still shine clearly. If parents, husbands, wives, brothers, sisters, must see those dear as their own life perish at last, while they themselves are saved, heaven in mercy will either extinguish their social susceptibilities, or else give them such a sweet and overpowering sense of the justice and goodness of God as shall not permit the joys of the blessed to be marred, nor the songs of the redeemed to be interrupted, with sighs of sympathetic sorrow."

Thus does the Christian mind labor in view of the God-dishonoring doctrine of future hopeless suffering. It is irreconcilable with any ideas we now have of the perfections of God or the "susceptibilities" of our natures; and so we must be transformed into stoics—made callous to all the agonies endured by "parents, husbands, wives, brothers, sisters," and friends, in order to reconcile us to their unmitigated and hopeless torture! But it is worthy of remark, that Prof. Stuart uses the term "perish." Why this? Because, his mind could but revolt at the horrid idea of "endless misery," for such relatives as he had named; and he quietly slides into the Scripture language. Thus he shows the power of truth on his own understanding. "The wicked shall perish; and the enemies of the Lord shall be as the fat of lambs; they shall consume: into smoke shall they consume away." Ps. xxxvii. 20. Such is "the law and the testimony;" and "if they speak not according to this word it is because there is no light in them." Isa. viii. 20.

We may safely say—That no transactions will take place in the "future retributions" that saints will need to have "their social susceptibilities extinguished" to witness them. God has said, "Come now, and let us reason together." Isa. i. 18. Men may affect to despise "reason," but God does not: and he has made no threat of punishment but what he is willing should now be tested by that faculty which he has implanted in man. He calls upon us now to exercise it, and condescends, himself, to become a party in the matter. Does any man think it can ever be made apparent to reason "now"—in this present life—that the future, hopeless and unmitigated sufferings of "parents, husbands, wives, brothers, and sisters," is reasonable or just? Prof. Stuart has given up that point; and, in giving it up, has stampt the entire fable of immortality in sin and the hopeless suffering of sinners in a future life as opposed to God and truth.

"How every hostile feeling becomes mitigated into something like kindness, when its object, perhaps lately proud, assuming, unjust, is now seen oppressed into dejection by calamity. The most cruel wild beast, or more cruel man, if languishing in death, and raising towards us a feeble and supplicating look, would certainly move our pity. How is this? Perhaps the character is not even supposed to be really changed amid the suffering that modifies its expression. Do we unconsciously take anything like a tender feeling, even for self, as a proof of some little goodness, or possibility of goodness? Is it for those beings alone that we feel nothing, who discover a hard and stupid indifference to self and everything besides? Perhaps any sentient being, the worst existent or possible, might be in a situation to move and justify our sympathy. What, then, shall we think of that theology which represents the men whom God has made most like himself, as exulting forever and ever in the most dreadful sufferings of the larger part of those who have been their fellow-inhabitants of this world?"—Mr. Foster's Journal, No. 494.

Thus the "reason" of the most pious revolts against the popular doctrine of hopeless torment. Torment is not the threatened punishment of the Bible to the finally impenitent. That idea has originated in barbarism, and was fostered and nourished by Papal blindness, superstition, and blasphemy, as a justification of her abominable cruelties. Shall Protestants still consent to wear the Harlot's attire; and charge the blessed God of truth and love with calling us to "come now" to "reason" with him, while He presents a doctrine for reason's approval, which reason can not but reject? Is that the way to turn men from sin to God? Reason and Revelation both answer—No. The Bible penalty for sin is loss—loss of life—of being. It is to come short of Eternal Life:—"Seeing ye judge yourselves unworthy of everlasting life." Acts xiii. 46. "The wages of sin is death." Rom. vi. 23. "If ye live after the flesh ye shall die." Rom. viii. 13. "Ye will not come to me that ye might have life." John v. 40. "They which shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world, and the resurrection from the dead....neither can they die any more." Luke xx. 35, 36. The wicked will not obtain that world; they come short of it—lose life—die—perish—are "destroyed forever." Such is the testimony of the Bible; and with this view reason harmonizes.

The love of God in the heart must lead men to doubt the truth of the doctrine of hopeless misery; or, if still retaining that doctrine in their theology, they are subjected to an anguish of spirit as unlike anything seen among the apostles, as torment is opposed to rejoicing. As one more illustration of this fact, we present the following from the "Practical Sermons" of Rev. Albert Barnes, Philadelphia, whose "Notes" on the Bible have been so highly esteemed. Pages 123–125 he says:

"That the immortal mind should be allowed to jeopard its infinite welfare, and that trifles should be allowed to draw it away from God, and virtue, and heaven; that any should suffer forever, lingering on in hopeless despair, and rolling amidst infinite torments without the possibility of alleviation, and without end; that, since God can save men, and will save a part, he has not purposed to save all; that, in a word, God, who claims to be worthy of the confidence of the universe, and to be a Being of infinite benevolence, should make such a world as this—full of sinners and sufferers—and that when an atonement had been made, he did not save all the race, and put an end to sin and woe forever....I have read to some extent what wise and good men have written. I have looked at their theories and explanations. I have endeavored to weigh their arguments; for my whole soul pants for light and relief on these questions. But I get neither; and in the distress and anguish of my own spirit, I confess that I see no light whatever. I see not one ray to disclose to me the reason why sin came into the world; why the earth is strewed with the dead and dying; and why man must suffer to all eternity. I have never seen a particle of light thrown on these subjects that has given a moment's ease to my tortured mind, nor have I an explanation to offer, a thought to suggest, which would be of relief to you. I trust others, as they profess to do, understand this better than I do, and that they have not the anguish of spirit which I have. But I confess, when I look upon a world of woe, filled with hosts to suffer forever—when I look upon friends and upon a whole race, all involved in this sin and danger, and when I see the great mass of them wholly unconcerned, and when I feel that God can only save them, and yet he does not do it, I am struck dumb—it is all dark, dark, dark to my soul, and I cannot disguise it."

Here is an honest expression of the natural and legitimate effects of the twin doctrines of natural immortality and future hopeless torment. But few ministers, whose souls are harassed and in the "dark" by these views, have the honesty of Mr. Barnes to confess it.

We have now presented our readers a short chapter on this subject, which goes to show the doctrine of hopeless torture in a future life is fast passing out of the theological world. But, with many, the scriptural doctrine of death is still overlooked, and the leaning is to restorationism, or to some other equally unscriptural mode of disposing of the plain testimony, "the soul that sinneth it shall die." Ezk. xviii. 4, 20.

To sweep away all those refuges of lies, let us begin with man as he is—"of the earth, earthy"—having no principle of immortality, but a probationer for it. If he persists in violating his Creator's laws, he brings on himself death—cessation of being; and that state is eternal. Such is the Scripture testimony. The evidence to this point is abundant and full. "Death is the wages of sin." "Sin, when it is finished, bringeth forth death;" and that death is eternal: hence the punishment is eternal—not torture, but cessation of being—to live no more.

WHAT IS THE CHRISTIAN'S HOPE?

We will now look more directly at the Old Testament doctrine on this subject. Let us begin with man's creation, Gen. ii. 7—"And the Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life; and man became a living soul." To this living soul God said, verse 17, "But of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, thou shalt not eat of it; for in the day that thou eatest thereof, thou shalt surely die." Or, "dying thou shalt die," as the Hebrew has it. Now look at Psa. cxlvi. 4, "His breath goeth forth, [that is what his Maker breathed into him] he returneth to his earth; [there goes his body] in that very day his thoughts perish." What is there left of him? Job says, chap. xiv. 10–12, "But man dieth and wasteth away: yea, man giveth up the ghost, and where is he. As the waters fail from the sea, and the flood decayeth and drieth up: So man lieth down and riseth not; till the heavens be no more, they shall not awake nor be raised out of their sleep."

Thus it appears that the Old Testament saints beheld nothing in death to bring them hope. What then was their hope? It was in the resurrection of the dead. Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, all were animated with this hope. See Heb. xi. 13, "These all died in faith, not having received the promises, but having seen them afar off, and were persuaded of them, and embraced them, and confessed that they were strangers and pilgrims on the earth." Also, verses 17–19, "By faith Abraham, when he was tried, offered up Isaac; and he that had received the promises offered up his only-begotten son....Accounting that God was able to raise him up, even from the dead; from whence also he received him in a figure."

The "figure" of which the apostle speaks, was the birth of Isaac. Speaking on that topic, he says of Abraham, Rom. iv. 19, "And being not weak in faith, he considered not his own body now dead, when he was about an hundred years old, neither yet the deadness of Sarah's womb." Isaac was born out of the course of nature. There was no more possibility, in the common course of nature, of Abraham's having a son, at that time of Sarah's life, than that the earth would spontaneously produce living men. But as God had promised, Abraham believed it; and by Isaac's birth he had a "figure of the resurrection," and accounted God able to accomplish it, and thus put to shame the modern deniers of "the resurrection of the dead." The holy men, of whom Paul speaks, looked for the fulfilment of the promises in the resurrection.

Job says, chap. xiv. 14, 15, "If a man die, shall he live again? all the days of my appointed time will I wait, till my change come. Thou shalt call and I will answer thee: thou wilt have a desire to the work of thine hands." Also, chap. xix. 25–27, "For I know that my Redeemer liveth, and that he shall stand at the latter day upon the earth: And though, after my skin, worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God: whom I shall see for myself, and mine eyes shall behold, and not another; though my reins are consumed within me." Here we see what Job's hope was. David expresses his, when he says, "I shall be satisfied when I awake in thy likeness." Isaiah says, chap. xxv. 6–8, "And in this mountain shall the Lord of hosts make unto all people a feast of fat things, a feast of wines on the lees, of fat things full of marrow, of wines on the lees well refined. And he will destroy in this mountain the face of the covering cast over all people, and the vail that is spread over all nations. He will swallow up death in victory: and the Lord God will wipe away tears from off all faces; and the rebuke of his people shall be taken away from off all the earth: for the Lord hath spoken it." And again, chap. xxvi. 19, "Thy dead men shall live, together with my dead body shall they arise: Awake and sing, ye that dwell in dust; for thy dew is as the dew of herbs, and the earth shall cast out the dead." Daniel is told, chap. xii. 1–3, Michael shall stand up—"and many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake....And they that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament; and they that turn many to righteousness, as the stars for ever and ever." Also, verse 13, "But go thou thy way till the end be, for thou shalt rest, and stand in thy lot at the end of the days." Thus we see what Daniel's hope must have been, for himself and the people of God,—not that they go to heaven at death; but, they shall have a resurrection from the dead. Hosea witnesses to the same hope, chap. xiii. 14, "I will ransom them from the power of the grave; I will redeem them from death: O death, I will be thy plagues: O grave, I will be thy destruction: repentance shall be hid from thine eyes."

Ezekiel is taught the same doctrine, in the 37th chap., where the whole house of Israel are presented to his view as so many dead men; and he is taught the restoration of both Judah and Israel to the land of Israel by the representation of the resurrection of the dead. And it is worthy of remark that he neither sees nor hears of an immortal soul coming into any of these dead bodies. He hears a "noise, and behold a shaking, and the bones come together—the sinews and the flesh come upon them, and the skin covered them," but, as yet, there is "no breath in them." Does Ezekiel prophecy to have their souls come down from heaven or up from hell? No: but to the "winds" for "breath," and "the breath came into them and they lived, and stood up upon their feet." An exact and true representation of the resurrection of the dead; no separate existence of souls in the case; but a resurrection of dead men.

When the resurrection takes place, then the questions, Isa. lxvi. 8, will be answered, "Shall the earth be made to bring forth in a day? or shall a nation be born at once?" Blessed hope—when all the saints that have suffered for our Lord and his cause, multitudes of whom have been persecuted unto death, shall all stand up at once, "an exceeding great army." They have been few on earth at any one time; but now starting from their graves into eternal life, clothed with immortality—surrounded by an innumerable company, the risen church, in raptures of joy, will exclaim, "Who hath gotten me all these?" Glorious hour—happy day—blessed, blessed hope. This is to be realized at the coming of the Lord. Will you not pray, "Come Lord Jesus"—and can you refrain from adding "even so," come quickly?

AN EXPOSITION OF PSALM XLIX, 12.

BY ELD. F. H. BURBANK.

"Nevertheless, man (being) in honor, abideth not: he is like the beasts that perish." This is the third of the series of texts which I think teaches the non-resurrection of wicked rich men, if not of all wicked men. The Psalm expounds itself. Commencing with the sixth verse, it reads: "They that trust in their wealth, and boast themselves in the multitude of their riches; none (of them) can by any means redeem his brother, nor give to God a ransom for him....that he should still live forever, (and) not see corruption. For he seeth that wise men die, likewise the fool and the brutish person perish, and leave their wealth to others....Nevertheless, man (being) in honor, abideth not: he is like the beasts that perish."

The Psalmist does not stop here. We commence again at the fourteenth verse and read onward. "Like sheep they are laid in the grave; ("They go in droves to the grave." Patrick's Com.) death shall feed on them; and the upright shall have dominion over them in the morning; and their beauty (mar., strength) shall consume in the grave (mar., the grave being an habitation to every one of them) from their dwelling." To my mind this looks as though neither God nor gold would redeem them from the power of the grave. The fifteenth verse strengthens this conviction. It reads: "But God will redeem my soul from the power (mar., hand) of the grave; for he shall receive me. Selah." That looks as though the others were not received, and hence would continue under the power of the grave.

In the remainder of the Psalm he says concerning these same rich men, "Be not thou afraid when one is made rich....He shall go to the generation of his fathers; they shall never see light. Man that is in honor, and understandeth not, is like the beasts that perish." "A three fold cord is not quickly broken." This Psalm is presented for the consideration of all who think that there is nothing in the Bible to lead one to doubt the resurrection of the wicked.

I am reminded of an objection, in the use of the word never. Some state that it is more properly translated by the phrase "not forever." I cannot see that it proves anything to the contrary of what has been written. It would be simply saying, "the wicked rich men shall not forever see light, or live, but the righteous shall forever see light, or live forever. So with the text: "They shall not forever perish," it would simply teach that the wicked shall forever perish, but the righteous shall not forever perish, because they shall be redeemed from the power of the grave. Such a rendering may be correct, but it merely confirms me in my "skepticism on the resurrection of the wicked."

While I am interested in this question I am much more interested in the welfare of the living wicked, and desire the prayers of all God's saints, that I may be the honored instrument in the hands of the Lord of saving thousands from death, by the preaching of the word. Yours searching the Scriptures.

THE WESTERN MISSION.—NO. 5.

FROM W. S. CAMPBELL.

LEWISTOWN, ILL., July 3, 1865.

To say that any such effect has followed our labors here as should have been expected from the time we have spent trying, would be to color the description; but to say that we have made all the effort that could have been reasonably expected, under the circumstances, we safely may. The people, in the town, are exceedingly sectarian; entirely under the teaching of popular theology; and kept from listening to anything new by their ministers. It is decidedly the most difficult place for us to get a hearing that I have ever attempted to hold meetings in. There is more of the narrow, bigoted, exclusive spirit than we would find in a dozen such places in the East. We have done something, in the way of scattering tracts, and have secured some friends; but we consider the time very nearly lost when we reflect that in other places, they are waiting for us, and willing to turn out and listen gladly to the truths which we have to set forth, in the name of the Lord.

Last evening, by the blessing of God, we walked some three miles and spake to a good school-house congregation of those who are interested and glad to hear on the Life theme. We have not given up in despair, respecting the cause in Lewistown, nor "shaken off the dust of our feet" against the place; for we have warm friends there, and we have some work in the immediate vicinity; preaching in school-houses, and "taking joyfully" the derision of the proud and aristocatic, who being entirely deluded by the doctrine of man's natural immortality, suppose they do God service by refusing to hear on the true grounds of our hope. And by despising the truth they are denying the Lord who bought them. Likewise, we take joyfully the inconvenineces they are deprivations which we suffer. These not a few, in this intolerable heat, by night or day. Sometimes we cannot sleep, and still "the heat consumes as by day." The other night we had to feel our way back to Otto, over a small prairie, and through a gulch, two miles, after having preached hard in the evening to a goodly number, and had an interesting season. What of that? We intend, as the old pioneer says, to girdle the town; and Br. Paull says he hopes he will grab it too. Br. Paull received us very cordially and gave us a pleasant home during our stay. Mr. Bearce, a very liberal and whole-hearted man, also, entertained us in a gentlemanly manner. Our meeting on Monday evening was very well attended, when we consider the heat of the time, with the labors of the people.

Our efforts are mostly employed among those who at this time are very much occupied; for it is the heat of harvest. We cannot expect to obtain large audiences except on Sundays. It appears to be unpropitious, if not unfortunate. We have only, in this case, to work as fully as possible, leaving the results with God.

CROAKERS AND THEIR IMITATORS.

REMARKS BY W. S. CAMPBELL.

I find that out here many who would otherwise be led to examine, have heard of that very peculiar structure, "The Hobby Horse." I therefore, should like to inquire for the benefit of those who wish to be found sincere seekers after truth, and the safety of after generations, who, really, are the

"HOBBY RIDERS"?

As a general rule when a man is accused of riding a hobby, the charge comes from one who is opposed to, and very lightly esteems the view which the accused advocates; and from its use in application to earnest advocates of divine doctrine, it becomes a "bugbear;" an easy way of persecution, and injury to an innocent, self-denying, and faithful man, often, whose influence is prevented before he has an opportunity to be heard, by this cant from the lips of designing men, or their dupes, about "hobby riders."

All that is aimed at, in the first place, by these adroit managers of the moral sense of those whom they have taken in their fly-trap, or expect to take in their "snare," or with their "drag" [nets], is, to destroy the influence of the man who, more earnestly than others, or more fully in accordance with the plain literal word of God, sets forth some grand and prominent truth; which, on the great basis principle of the Adventist's (dispensational truth) becomes the duty of those who receive it; and this has been argued by hundreds among them from the beginning. Or, the man may find, in the examination of the gospel, which he endeavors to preach, as a whole, some views that he must speak upon. If they chance to be opposed to the "decrees" which have been delivered, by the Elders to the scattered brethren, "for to keep," though he should preach only the same principles that the whole body has advocated, the honest soul, who studied hard to master these principles, and has devoted his life to their development, is trumpeted as a hobby horsical mountebank, who mounts the rocking image, and labors himself to absolute fatigue, merely for the pleasure of motion, and accustomed girations—or being such a fool that he does not know that all his movements leave him stationary.

It is easy for some inventive Yankee to start a new "Boston notion," which simple minded sucklings will catch at, with a will, as a relief to the difficulties which their own principles of interpretation involve them in. Immediately they are far removed from the ancient landmarks, and eternally harping upon the new discovery, while he who remains guarding the precious, old inculcation (in its principle and power) is just simply proclaimed as a "hobbyist."

Pressed in argument upon the grounds of philosophical interpretation, which the whole body by common cousent has adopted, they resort to the dodge, to subterfuge; indorse principles of theological construction, long since given up by modern expositors, and especially, by themselves; even stride a jaded nag which the Universalist has left all saddled, with reeking flanks, for their necessary employment; or, some other theological rack-a-bones, which some effete creed has ridden itself to death upon, is mounted, and with spur and reign, and rattle of pummel, they dash away, from the real field of contest, in Quixotic enthusiasm, to bring up their "high horse" against some fancied giant. Chivalric knights of doctrine! Alas, poor Rosinante!

They never ride a hobby! Not they! In their flight from that great truth which became "a burdensome stone" to them, they seem to see people stationary or moving on with a steady pace: they scream "hobby horse," and goad their dying steed to some new mythological skulking place.

Really, there is one hobby that they have been in the constant habit of straddling since there began to be any great advance, in doctrine, among us—and no horse could have served them better—that is, the continual cry against those who have been beyond them in truth, of riding "hobbies." Some one, (young in years, or young in the cause; and not always, young in either sense) who never had but one theological idea in his life,—and that he borrowed—comes round where an accredited minister has been endeavoring to waken an interest, and build up a church, which was low enough before—not discovering that he was not well received,—preaching the gospel as a complete system, and something more than an engine for exciting feelings, merely, whether of immediate fear or joy. With seeming, pious repugnance this new comer mourns over the sad desolation produced by doctrinal preaching—which means doctrines, he neither believes nor understands,—and with ironical solemnity, proceeds, in a paper, (which he knows, very well, how to propitiate) to break in pieces a "hobby horse."

There is, again, another object to be secured, and it is peculiar to all who wish to build up and consolidate a sect, which is to advance their own interest, whether compatible with truth and conscience, or otherwise. There is some organization to be rendered popular, or some publishing interest to aid, and with these seductive approaches to the unsuspecting, the object is to be forwarded.

Within our time, the doctrine of Christ's coming, literally, was called a hobby; as also the real reign of Christ, whether Millerite or Millenarian. At the same time, those who, in the early days of our preaching taught the sleep of the dead and the destruction of the wicked, were accused, by other advent brethren, of having a seat on the same nondescript animal.

Now, gentlemen, you who never are found on this much berated beast, or representation of one, in the ordinary sense of hobby (?) just define your position and we will be exceedingly obliged to you. Do you not take occasion to advocate, almost invariably, in those placee where the doctrine of Life in Christ only, has been taught,—the view of the resurrection of the wicked, which is, according to your own admissions, none the more true for having been preached so long? And have you not made a point to dwell upon those positions which conflict with ours? Yes; and where we were disposed to be conservative, driven on, till a split was the effect? No hobbying in that, surely! Really, it makes a difference which ox is gored.

It seems now that all that might not be denominated weakkneed conservatism is yclept "his hobby." Almost all the great things we see in the political condition have been the "hobbies" and the "radicalism" of some men. Look at the subject. And be looked at! We will not here attempt a decision upon the merits of any view we state. We only note the facts.

You preach time. You advocate non-resistance. You insist upon the burning of the world, when Christ comes; a resurrection of all the wicked, and general judgment afterward, to secure executive suffering on them;

FUTURE RETRIBUTION.

Last week we gave our readers an extract from Bishop Newton's Works, showing the struggle of a powerful and pious mind, manacled by the theory of inherent immortality, to rid itself of the terrible consequences growing out of that theory, in view of the Bible announcement of eternal punishment. The following remarks of Prof. STUART, some years since, in the Biblical Repository, shows how another powerful and pious mind labored in endeavoring to reconcile hopeless torment with the perfections of God or the felicity of the saints in glory. He says:

"That the subject is one of fearful interest, none will deny who believe in future retribution. That there are difficulties pressed by it upon the mind, when one thinks of his own condition, that of his beloved friends, or of his brethren of the human race, it would be mere pretence to deny. But it is a consolation to believe, that behind any clouds, however dark, that interpose between us and the light of the sun, his beams still shine clearly. If parents, husbands, wives, brothers, sisters, must see those dear as their own life perish at last, while they themselves are saved, heaven in mercy will either extinguish their social susceptibilities, or else give them such a sweet and overpowering sense of the justice and goodness of God as shall not permit the joys of the blessed to be marred, nor the songs of the redeemed to be interrupted, with sighs of sympathetic sorrow."

Thus does the Christian mind labor in view of the God-dishonoring doctrine of future hopeless suffering. It is irreconcilable with any ideas we now have of the perfections of God or the "susceptibilities" of our natures; and so we must be transformed into stoics—made callous to all the agonies endured by "parents, husbands, wives, brothers, sisters," and friends, in order to reconcile us to their unmitigated and hopeless torture! But it is worthy of remark, that Prof. Stuart uses the term "perish." Why this? Because, his mind could but revolt at the horrid idea of "endless misery," for such relatives as he had named; and he quietly slides into the Scripture language. Thus he shows the power of truth on his own understanding. "The wicked shall perish; and the enemies of the Lord shall be as the fat of lambs; they shall consume: into smoke shall they consume away." Ps. xxxvii. 20. Such is "the law and the testimony;" and "if they speak not according to this word it is because there is no light in them." Isa. viii. 20.

We may safely say—That no transactions will take place in the "future retributions" that saints will need to have "their social susceptibilities extinguished" to witness them. God has said, "Come now, and let us reason together." Isa. i. 18. Men may affect to despise "reason," but God does not: and he has made no threat of punishment but what he is willing should now be tested by that faculty which he has implanted in man. He calls upon us now to exercise it, and condescends, himself, to become a party in the matter. Does any man think it can ever be made apparent to reason "now"—in this present life—that the future, hopeless and unmitigated sufferings of "parents, husbands, wives, brothers, and sisters," is reasonable or just? Prof. Stuart has given up that point; and, in giving it up, has stampt the entire fable of immortality in sin and the hopeless suffering of sinners in a future life as opposed to God and truth.

"How every hostile feeling becomes mitigated into something like kindness, when its object, perhaps lately proud, assuming, unjust, is now seen oppressed into dejection by calamity. The most cruel wild beast, or more cruel man, if languishing in death, and raising towards us a feeble and supplicating look, would certainly move our pity. How is this? Perhaps the character is not even supposed to be really changed amid the suffering that modifies its expression. Do we unconsciously take anything like a tender feeling, even for self, as a proof of some little goodness, or possibility of goodness? Is it for those beings alone that we feel nothing, who discover a hard and stupid indifference to self and everything besides? Perhaps any sentient being, the worst existent or possible, might be in a situation to move and justify our sympathy. What, then, shall we think of that theology which represents the men whom God has made most like himself, as exulting forever and ever in the most dreadful sufferings of the larger part of those who have been their fellow-inhabitants of this world?"—Mr. Foster's Journal, No. 494.

Thus the "reason" of the most pious revolts against the popular doctrine of hopeless torment. Torment is not the threatened punishment of the Bible to the finally impenitent. That idea has originated in barbarism, and was fostered and nourished by Papal blindness, superstition, and blasphemy, as a justification of her abominable cruelties. Shall Protestants still consent to wear the Harlot's attire; and charge the blessed God of truth and love with calling us to "come now" to "reason" with him, while He presents a doctrine for reason's approval, which reason can not but reject? Is that the way to turn men from sin to God? Reason and Revelation both answer—No. The Bible penalty for sin is loss—loss of life—of being. It is to come short of Eternal Life:—"Seeing ye judge yourselves unworthy of everlasting life." Acts xiii. 46. "The wages of sin is death." Rom. vi. 23. "If ye live after the flesh ye shall die." Rom. viii. 13. "Ye will not come to me that ye might have life." John v. 40. "They which shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world, and the resurrection from the dead....neither can they die any more." Luke xx. 35, 36. The wicked will not obtain that world; they come short of it—lose life—die—perish—are "destroyed forever." Such is the testimony of the Bible; and with this view reason harmonizes.

The love of God in the heart must lead men to doubt the truth of the doctrine of hopeless misery; or, if still retaining that doctrine in their theology, they are subjected to an anguish of spirit as unlike anything seen among the apostles, as torment is opposed to rejoicing. As one more illustration of this fact, we present the following from the "Practical Sermons" of Rev. Albert Barnes, Philadelphia, whose "Notes" on the Bible have been so highly esteemed. Pages 123–125 he says:

"That the immortal mind should be allowed to jeopard its infinite welfare, and that trifles should be allowed to draw it away from God, and virtue, and heaven; that any should suffer forever, lingering on in hopeless despair, and rolling amidst infinite torments without the possibility of alleviation, and without end; that, since God can save men, and will save a part, he has not purposed to save all; that, in a word, God, who claims to be worthy of the confidence of the universe, and to be a Being of infinite benevolence, should make such a world as this—full of sinners and sufferers—and that when an atonement had been made, he did not save all the race, and put an end to sin and woe forever....I have read to some extent what wise and good men have written. I have looked at their theories and explanations. I have endeavored to weigh their arguments; for my whole soul pants for light and relief on these questions. But I get neither; and in the distress and anguish of my own spirit, I confess that I see no light whatever. I see not one ray to disclose to me the reason why sin came into the world; why the earth is strewed with the dead and dying; and why man must suffer to all eternity. I have never seen a particle of light thrown on these subjects that has given a moment's ease to my tortured mind, nor have I an explanation to offer, a thought to suggest, which would be of relief to you. I trust others, as they profess to do, understand this better than I do, and that they have not the anguish of spirit which I have. But I confess, when I look upon a world of woe, filled with hosts to suffer forever—when I look upon friends and upon a whole race, all involved in this sin and danger, and when I see the great mass of them wholly unconcerned, and when I feel that God can only save them, and yet he does not do it, I am struck dumb—it is all dark, dark, dark to my soul, and I cannot disguise it."

Here is an honest expression of the natural and legitimate effects of the twin doctrines of natural immortality and future hopeless torment. But few ministers, whose souls are harassed and in the "dark" by these views, have the honesty of Mr. Barnes to confess it.

We have now presented our readers a short chapter on this subject, which goes to show the doctrine of hopeless torture in a future life is fast passing out of the theological world. But, with many, the scriptural doctrine of death is still overlooked, and the leaning is to restorationism, or to some other equally unscriptural mode of disposing of the plain testimony, "the soul that sinneth it shall die." Ezk. xviii. 4, 20.

To sweep away all those refuges of lies, let us begin with man as he is—"of the earth, earthy"—having no principle of immortality, but a probationer for it. If he persists in violating his Creator's laws, he brings on himself death—cessation of being; and that state is eternal. Such is the Scripture testimony. The evidence to this point is abundant and full. "Death is the wages of sin." "Sin, when it is finished, bringeth forth death;" and that death is eternal: hence the punishment is eternal—not torture, but cessation of being—to live no more.

WHAT IS THE CHRISTIAN'S HOPE?

We will now look more directly at the Old Testament doctrine on this subject. Let us begin with man's creation, Gen. ii. 7—"And the Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life; and man became a living soul." To this living soul God said, verse 17, "But of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, thou shalt not eat of it; for in the day that thou eatest thereof, thou shalt surely die." Or, "dying thou shalt die," as the Hebrew has it. Now look at Psa. cxlvi. 4, "His breath goeth forth, [that is what his Maker breathed into him] he returneth to his earth; [there goes his body] in that very day his thoughts perish." What is there left of him? Job says, chap. xiv. 10–12, "But man dieth and wasteth away: yea, man giveth up the ghost, and where is he. As the waters fail from the sea, and the flood decayeth and drieth up: So man lieth down and riseth not; till the heavens be no more, they shall not awake nor be raised out of their sleep."

Thus it appears that the Old Testament saints beheld nothing in death to bring them hope. What then was their hope? It was in the resurrection of the dead. Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, all were animated with this hope. See Heb. xi. 13, "These all died in faith, not having received the promises, but having seen them afar off, and were persuaded of them, and embraced them, and confessed that they were strangers and pilgrims on the earth." Also, verses 17–19, "By faith Abraham, when he was tried, offered up Isaac; and he that had received the promises offered up his only-begotten son....Accounting that God was able to raise him up, even from the dead; from whence also he received him in a figure."

The "figure" of which the apostle speaks, was the birth of Isaac. Speaking on that topic, he says of Abraham, Rom. iv. 19, "And being not weak in faith, he considered not his own body now dead, when he was about an hundred years old, neither yet the deadness of Sarah's womb." Isaac was born out of the course of nature. There was no more possibility, in the common course of nature, of Abraham's having a son, at that time of Sarah's life, than that the earth would spontaneously produce living men. But as God had promised, Abraham believed it; and by Isaac's birth he had a "figure of the resurrection," and accounted God able to accomplish it, and thus put to shame the modern deniers of "the resurrection of the dead." The holy men, of whom Paul speaks, looked for the fulfilment of the promises in the resurrection.

Job says, chap. xiv. 14, 15, "If a man die, shall he live again? all the days of my appointed time will I wait, till my change come. Thou shalt call and I will answer thee: thou wilt have a desire to the work of thine hands." Also, chap. xix. 25–27, "For I know that my Redeemer liveth, and that he shall stand at the latter day upon the earth: And though, after my skin, worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God: whom I shall see for myself, and mine eyes shall behold, and not another; though my reins are consumed within me." Here we see what Job's hope was. David expresses his, when he says, "I shall be satisfied when I awake in thy likeness." Isaiah says, chap. xxv. 6–8, "And in this mountain shall the Lord of hosts make unto all people a feast of fat things, a feast of wines on the lees, of fat things full of marrow, of wines on the lees well refined. And he will destroy in this mountain the face of the covering cast over all people, and the vail that is spread over all nations. He will swallow up death in victory: and the Lord God will wipe away tears from off all faces; and the rebuke of his people shall be taken away from off all the earth: for the Lord hath spoken it." And again, chap. xxvi. 19, "Thy dead men shall live, together with my dead body shall they arise: Awake and sing, ye that dwell in dust; for thy dew is as the dew of herbs, and the earth shall cast out the dead." Daniel is told, chap. xii. 1–3, Michael shall stand up—"and many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake....And they that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament; and they that turn many to righteousness, as the stars for ever and ever." Also, verse 13, "But go thou thy way till the end be, for thou shalt rest, and stand in thy lot at the end of the days." Thus we see what Daniel's hope must have been, for himself and the people of God,—not that they go to heaven at death; but, they shall have a resurrection from the dead. Hosea witnesses to the same hope, chap. xiii. 14, "I will ransom them from the power of the grave; I will redeem them from death: O death, I will be thy plagues: O grave, I will be thy destruction: repentance shall be hid from thine eyes."

Ezekiel is taught the same doctrine, in the 37th chap., where the whole house of Israel are presented to his view as so many dead men; and he is taught the restoration of both Judah and Israel to the land of Israel by the representation of the resurrection of the dead. And it is worthy of remark that he neither sees nor hears of an immortal soul coming into any of these dead bodies. He hears a "noise, and behold a shaking, and the bones come together—the sinews and the flesh come upon them, and the skin covered them," but, as yet, there is "no breath in them." Does Ezekiel prophecy to have their souls come down from heaven or up from hell? No: but to the "winds" for "breath," and "the breath came into them and they lived, and stood up upon their feet." An exact and true representation of the resurrection of the dead; no separate existence of souls in the case; but a resurrection of dead men.

When the resurrection takes place, then the questions, Isa. lxvi. 8, will be answered, "Shall the earth be made to bring forth in a day? or shall a nation be born at once?" Blessed hope—when all the saints that have suffered for our Lord and his cause, multitudes of whom have been persecuted unto death, shall all stand up at once, "an exceeding great army." They have been few on earth at any one time; but now starting from their graves into eternal life, clothed with immortality—surrounded by an innumerable company, the risen church, in raptures of joy, will exclaim, "Who hath gotten me all these?" Glorious hour—happy day—blessed, blessed hope. This is to be realized at the coming of the Lord. Will you not pray, "Come Lord Jesus"—and can you refrain from adding "even so," come quickly?

AN EXPOSITION OF PSALM XLIX, 12.

BY ELD. F. H. BURBANK.

"Nevertheless, man (being) in honor, abideth not: he is like the beasts that perish." This is the third of the series of texts which I think teaches the non-resurrection of wicked rich men, if not of all wicked men. The Psalm expounds itself. Commencing with the sixth verse, it reads: "They that trust in their wealth, and boast themselves in the multitude of their riches; none (of them) can by any means redeem his brother, nor give to God a ransom for him....that he should still live forever, (and) not see corruption. For he seeth that wise men die, likewise the fool and the brutish person perish, and leave their wealth to others....Nevertheless, man (being) in honor, abideth not: he is like the beasts that perish."

The Psalmist does not stop here. We commence again at the fourteenth verse and read onward. "Like sheep they are laid in the grave; ("They go in droves to the grave." Patrick's Com.) death shall feed on them; and the upright shall have dominion over them in the morning; and their beauty (mar., strength) shall consume in the grave (mar., the grave being an habitation to every one of them) from their dwelling." To my mind this looks as though neither God nor gold would redeem them from the power of the grave. The fifteenth verse strengthens this conviction. It reads: "But God will redeem my soul from the power (mar., hand) of the grave; for he shall receive me. Selah." That looks as though the others were not received, and hence would continue under the power of the grave.

In the remainder of the Psalm he says concerning these same rich men, "Be not thou afraid when one is made rich....He shall go to the generation of his fathers; they shall never see light. Man that is in honor, and understandeth not, is like the beasts that perish." "A three fold cord is not quickly broken." This Psalm is presented for the consideration of all who think that there is nothing in the Bible to lead one to doubt the resurrection of the wicked.

I am reminded of an objection, in the use of the word never. Some state that it is more properly translated by the phrase "not forever." I cannot see that it proves anything to the contrary of what has been written. It would be simply saying, "the wicked rich men shall not forever see light, or live, but the righteous shall forever see light, or live forever. So with the text: "They shall not forever perish," it would simply teach that the wicked shall forever perish, but the righteous shall not forever perish, because they shall be redeemed from the power of the grave. Such a rendering may be correct, but it merely confirms me in my "skepticism on the resurrection of the wicked."

While I am interested in this question I am much more interested in the welfare of the living wicked, and desire the prayers of all God's saints, that I may be the honored instrument in the hands of the Lord of saving thousands from death, by the preaching of the word. Yours searching the Scriptures.

THE WESTERN MISSION.—NO. 5.

FROM W. S. CAMPBELL.

LEWISTOWN, ILL., July 3, 1865.

To say that any such effect has followed our labors here as should have been expected from the time we have spent trying, would be to color the description; but to say that we have made all the effort that could have been reasonably expected, under the circumstances, we safely may. The people, in the town, are exceedingly sectarian; entirely under the teaching of popular theology; and kept from listening to anything new by their ministers. It is decidedly the most difficult place for us to get a hearing that I have ever attempted to hold meetings in. There is more of the narrow, bigoted, exclusive spirit than we would find in a dozen such places in the East. We have done something, in the way of scattering tracts, and have secured some friends; but we consider the time very nearly lost when we reflect that in other places, they are waiting for us, and willing to turn out and listen gladly to the truths which we have to set forth, in the name of the Lord.

Last evening, by the blessing of God, we walked some three miles and spake to a good school-house congregation of those who are interested and glad to hear on the Life theme. We have not given up in despair, respecting the cause in Lewistown, nor "shaken off the dust of our feet" against the place; for we have warm friends there, and we have some work in the immediate vicinity; preaching in school-houses, and "taking joyfully" the derision of the proud and aristocatic, who being entirely deluded by the doctrine of man's natural immortality, suppose they do God service by refusing to hear on the true grounds of our hope. And by despising the truth they are denying the Lord who bought them. Likewise, we take joyfully the inconvenincces they are deprivations which we suffer. These not a few, in this intolerable heat, by night or day. Sometimes we cannot sleep, and still "the heat consumes as by day." The other night we had to feel our way back to Otto, over a small prairie, and through a gulch, two miles, after having preached hard in the evening to a goodly number, and had an interesting season. What of that? We intend, as the old pioneer says, to girdle the town; and Br. Paull says he hopes he will grab it too. Br. Paull received us very cordially and gave us a pleasant home during our stay. Mr. Bearce, a very liberal and whole-hearted man, also, entertained us in a gentlemanly manner. Our meeting on Monday evening was very well attended, when we consider the heat of the time, with the labors of the people.

Our efforts are mostly employed among those who at this time are very much occupied; for it is the heat of harvest. We cannot expect to obtain large audiences except on Sundays. It appears to be unpropitious, if not unfortunate. We have only, in this case, to work as fully as possible, leaving the results with God.

CROAKERS AND THEIR IMITATORS.

REMARKS BY W. S. CAMPBELL.

I find that out here many who would otherwise be led to examine, have heard of that very peculiar structure, "The Hobby Horse." I therefore, should like to inquire for the benefit of those who wish to be found sincere seekers after truth, and the safety of after generations, who, really, are the

"HOBBY RIDERS"?

As a general rule when a man is accused of riding a hobby, the charge comes from one who is opposed to, and very lightly esteems the view which the accused advocates; and from its use in application to earnest advocates of divine doctrine, it becomes a "bugbear;" an easy way of persecution, and injury to an innocent, self-denying, and faithful man, often, whose influence is prevented before he has an opportunity to be heard, by this cant from the lips of designing men, or their dupes, about "hobby riders."

All that is aimed at, in the first place, by these adroit managers of the moral sense of those whom they have taken in their fly-trap, or expect to take in their "snare," or with their "drag" [nets], is, to destroy the influence of the man who, more earnestly than others, or more fully in accordance with the plain literal word of God, sets forth some grand and prominent truth; which, on the great basis principle of the Adventist's (dispensational truth) becomes the duty of those who receive it; and this has been argued by hundreds among them from the beginning. Or, the man may find, in the examination of the gospel, which he endeavors to preach, as a whole, some views that he must speak upon. If they chance to be opposed to the "decrees" which have been delivered, by the Elders to the scattered brethren, "for to keep," though he should preach only the same principles that the whole body has advocated, the honest soul, who studied hard to master these principles, and has devoted his life to their development, is trumpeted as a hobby horsical mountebank, who mounts the rocking image, and labors himself to absolute fatigue, merely for the pleasure of motion, and accustomed girations—or being such a fool that he does not know that all his movements leave him stationary.

It is easy for some inventive Yankee to start a new "Boston notion," which simple minded sucklings will catch at, with a will, as a relief to the difficulties which their own principles of interpretation involve them in. Immediately they are far removed from the ancient landmarks, and eternally harping upon the new discovery, while he who remains guarding the precious, old inculcation (in its principle and power) is just simply proclaimed as a "hobbyist."

Pressed in argument upon the grounds of philosophical interpretation, which the whole body by common consent has adopted, they resort to the dodge, to subterfuge; indorse principles of theological construction, long since given up by modern expositors, and especially, by themselves; even stride a jaded nag which the Universalist has left all saddled, with reeking flanks, for their necessary employment; or, some other theological rack-a-bones, which some effete creed has ridden itself to death upon, is mounted, and with spur and reign, and rattle of pummel, they dash away, from the real field of contest, in Quixotic enthusiasm, to bring up their "high horse" against some fancied giant. Chivalric knights of doctrine! Alas, poor Rosinante!

They never ride a hobby! Not they! In their flight from that great truth which became "a burdensome stone" to them, they seem to see people stationary or moving on with a steady pace: they scream "hobby horse," and goad their dying steed to some new mythological skulking place.

Really, there is one hobby that they have been in the constant habit of straddling since there began to be any great advance, in doctrine, among us—and no horse could have served them better—that is, the continual cry against those who have been beyond them in truth, of riding "hobbies." Some one, (young in years, or young in the cause; and not always, young in either sense) who never had but one theological idea in his life,—and that he borrowed—comes round where an accredited minister has been endeavoring to waken an interest, and build up a church, which was low enough before—not discovering that he was not well received,—preaching the gospel as a complete system, and something more than an engine for exciting feelings, merely, whether of immediate fear or joy. With seeming, pious repugnance this new comer mourns over the sad desolation produced by doctrinal preaching—which means doctrines, he neither believes nor understands,—and with ironical solemnity, proceeds, in a paper, (which he knows, very well, how to propitiate) to break in pieces a "hobby horse."

There is, again, another object to be secured, and it is peculiar to all who wish to build up and consolidate a sect, which is to advance their own interest, whether compatible with truth and conscience, or otherwise. There is some organization to be rendered popular, or some publishing interest to aid, and with these seductive approaches to the unsuspecting, the object is to be forwarded.

Within our time, the doctrine of Christ's coming, literally, was called a hobby; as also the real reign of Christ, whether Millerite or Millenarian. At the same time, those who, in the early days of our preaching taught the sleep of the dead and the destruction of the wicked, were accused, by other advent brethren, of having a seat on the same nondescript animal.

Now, gentlemen, you who never are found on this much berated beast, or representation of one, in the ordinary sense of hobby (?) just define your position and we will be exceedingly obliged to you. Do you not take occasion to advocate, almost invariably, in those places where the doctrine of Life in Christ only, has been taught,—the view of the resurrection of the wicked, which is, according to your own admissions, none the more true for having been preached so long? And have you not made a point to dwell upon those positions which conflict with ours? Yes; and where we were disposed to be conservative, driven on, till a split was the effect? No hobbying in that, surely! Really, it makes a difference which ox is gored.

It seems now that all that might not be denominated weakkneed conservatism is yclept "his hobby." Almost all the great things we see in the political condition have been the "hobbies" and the "radicalism" of some men. Look at the subject. And be looked at! We will not here attempt a decision upon the merits of any view we state. We only note the facts.

You preach time. You advocate non-resistance. You insist upon the burning of the world, when Christ comes; a resurrection of all the wicked, and general judgment afterward, to secure executive suffering on them;

(some of whom, have been executed before;) a substitutionary sacrifice; a thousand years of binding of a literal satan; (in what kind of a pit?) the burning of the wicked on the New Earth; and the different set theories on prophecy: all of these, by one and another, and all around, and you never occupy the hobby seat! You might publish on eclipses in the attempt by astronomical science to establish a speculative bible point, from now till the end of time, and you would not then behold the beam that is in your eye. Now, some men seem to be growing old, for they join in the hue-and-cry of the children about "hobbies"—when they mean heresy; but know well, if they say that, they can be handled and dissected by this sword of truth. Let us have the same privelege which you claim for yourselves, and if you are not as greatly at fault as we, then hobby is not hobby.

Consistency, thou art an ancient jewel!

Another Discovery at Jerusalem.

Everthing connected with the Holy City is of interest. We therefore gladly print the following which is extracted from a letter of the Rev. W. Baily, one of our missionaries at that station: "You will, perhaps, remember that nearly three years ago there was much said and written about the discovery of a spring near arch Ecce Homo. The Jews in particular flocked in great numbers to see it, until they were prevented by the Latins, who claimed it as their property. The Jews believed that the finding of this spring indicated that important events were nigh at hand, as one of their tradition says that 'previous to Messiah's appearance fountains and springs of water will be found in Jerusalem. Not believing this could be a spring, I did not at that time go see it; but last week I accompanied Dr. Chaplain and three or four others to examine it and a subterranean passage discovered at the same time by Mr. Picrotti, and I was not a little surprised to find it to be a veritable spring. There is a good body of water nearly two yards broad, four yards long, and about five feet deep. The water is somewhat blackish, similiar to that of Siloam, and it remains the same height throughout the year. The passage at the commencement of which lies this spring is certainly a very remarkable one, and of considerable size, so that it must surely have been something more than a sewer, as some have imagined, for it is well built, and is I should think, full twelve feet wide, and as about as many high, upwards of twenty-five yards of it have been explored, but not cleared, as it is still half filled with earth and rubbish. Some suppose it runs down from this point, the Ecce Homo Arch, to the site of the temple. On ascending the steps leading down to the spring, we were led aside, when half way up, and shown a substantial diece of old pavement which appeared to run onward beneath the foundation of the house; we were told these stones were a part of the pavement of the Via Dilorosa, immediately beneath the Ecce Homo Arch. They certainly bear marks of great antiquity, and I could not help feeling that it was very probable it was a part of that very pavement which our Saviour Himself had often trod. I must say that it is one of the most interesting things I have seen here. The school and Hospital of the Sisters of Zion are built over this site; two of the nuns very kindly conducted us over their building before taking us down to the spring, &c. They have a similiar establishment to that of the German Deaconesses—viz., a Girl's Boarding and Day school, and a Hospital for the reception of all persons, of any creed, who may apply for entrance. In the school we found about twenty healthy looking, clean, and neatly dressed girls, who appeared very cheerful and happy. French and Arabic appear the principal languages taught; they sung at our request a verse or two of a French hymn. I thought the whole establishment a superior one in arrangement and appearance; the largest and best in the city. Several English travelers I find, have visited it this year; amongst the number are Lady Herbert, her family and suite. We rejoice to day to have very evident signs of abundance of rain; there has been a long and serious drought and the showers now will indeed be a great blessing, not only in doing good to the parched ground and corn, but also in driving away the agues and fevers which a great many people are now beginning to suffer from."—Israelite Indeed.

The Graces: How Obtained.

Bro. Storrs:—The following extract from "Beecher's Life Thoughts," has so much truthfulness in it, and is so well calculated to correct the false impression many entertain in regard to the subject of which it treats, that I feel inclined to copy it for the benefit of those who have never read it. L. J. Beach.

Many people seem to imagine that God keeps a gracious apothecary's shop above, with faith, and meekness and humility, put up in bottles ready for purchasers; and as they could go into a perfumer's here below, and ask for this or that extract, so they can go to God and ask for this or that grace. Christian graces can never be obtained in this way. They must be the outgrowth of life. The prayer for graces will be answered; but God will make us work out each one with fear and trembling. The spire that almost touches the stars, does not rise isolated from the ground; beneath it and supporting it, is the massy substructure,—the cathedral of stone. So faith cannot soar to heaven alone; it must be the steeple and the spire of the whole life building."

The Herald of Life.

NEW YORK, JULY 19, 1865.

NO IMMORTALITY NOR FUTURE LIFE, EXCEPT IN JESUS CHRIST ALONE, AND BY A RESURRECTION AT THE LAST DAY IF DEAD, OR A CHANGE IF ALIVE.

Curious Logic.

"The annihilation of the wicked is repulsive to the Christian. What comfort can there be to the dying Christian, in the idea that he is going to lie dormant until the resurrection: The very thought is repulsive. Paul said, 'I desire to depart, and to be with Christ, which is far better.' Can any one suppose that he believed that he should cease to exist? His desire was to be with Christ. And he evidently anticipated that he should be with him when he died. Can it be pretended that Stephen anticipated a fatal extinction of being, when he saw the heavens opened, and the Son of man on the right hand of God, and prayed, 'Lord Jesus, receive my spirit?' No. The dying Christian looks in faith, for an immediate union with Jesus. B."

This beats all the arguments ever urged by a "Christian!" The annihilation of the wicked "is repulsive to the Christian!" therefore, the wicked must be kept eternally alive in undescribable sufferings, cursing God and the Lamb! There is nothing repulsive in that, to such Christians as "B," it seems. Well, we do not envy him his sensibilities. Strange indeed that "B" should offer such an "objection" to "the annihilation of the wicked!" He must have forgotten what he was attempting to do, and so confounded the "state of the dead" with the subject of his discourse, or being barren of argument, threw in this "objection" to draw off attention, so that he might stir the "repulsive" feelings of Christians; who, it seems, he thinks, would much rather some unconverted wife, husband, father, brother, sister, mother, or child, would suffer the endless torment of fire and brimstone, and live to curse God and his Christ eternally, than that "the Christian" should sleep quietly from death to "the resurrection!"

But as "B" has left his text—"the annihilation of the wicked"—to preach a short sermon on the state of the dead, we will notice the sermon, though out of place. Will "B" tell us if it is "repulsive" to a "Christian" to die? That is, Is it generally so? Or, do they covet death? Do not tell us that some die triumphatly: that we know and admit. But is death that which Christians covet? or do they show the same desire to protract life as others, and use the same means for that end? If so, then death, itself, is "repulsive to the Christian." Because it is so, is that an argument to prove they do not and will not die! Just as good, and as forcible as that of "B," that they will not "lie dormant," or sleep "till the resurrection." The fact is, our Lord made his followers no promise that they should be with him at death; but he did promise again and again, "I will raise him up at the last day:" see John vi. 39, 40, 44, 54. It was the resurrection at Christ's return "from heaven" that was the great theme of comfort to the New Testament saints, and not an imaginary "going to heaven at death." No such expression ever occurs in the teaching of Christ or his apostles. On the contrary, Paul himself expressly declares—"If the dead rise not, then is not Christ raised;....then they also which are fallen asleep in Christ are perished;" and "If after the manner of men I have fought with beasts at Ephesus, what advantageth it me, if the dead rise not?" see 1 Corth. xv. 16–18, 32; and Peter declares, on the day of Pentecost while speaking under the immediate influence of the Holy Spirit, "David is not ascended into the heavens;" though he had been dead several hundred years. Old and New Testament saints all deprecate death as something "repulsive" and undesirable; and not one of the New Testament saints express the desire to die; but speak of it as just the reverse, though they sustain themselves in view of it by the hope of Christ's return from heaven and the resurrection at that day. Paul thus speaks, 2 Corth. i. 8–10, "We despaired even of life: but we had the sentence of death in ourselves, that we should not trust in ourselves, but in God which raiseth the dead: who delivered us from so great a death," &c. We see here in what light Paul viewed death, and that the only sustaining hope in view of it was that God would raise him from the dead.

In the Epistle from which "B" has quoted Paul's "desire," that apostle speaks of death on this wise—"Epaphroditus was sick nigh unto death; but God had mercy on him," &c., chap. ii. 25–27. Now, did Paul in one and the same Epistle tell the Philippians that he himself desired to die, and that it was a mercy in God not to let Epaphroditus die? Was Paul so selfish as to wish for himself death, and would esteem it "far better" to die than to live, and yet unwilling that his brother, Epaphroditus, should share with him in the bliss of being dead? and say, that "God had mercy on him" and would not let him die? Was Paul the Apostle such a man? Was he such a stupid being as to pronounce it "far better" to die in one breath, and in the next, to affirm it was God's mercy to Epaphroditus that he did not die?

Whatever Paul meant by the term "depart" —quoted by "B"—he did not mean by it, "to die:" for Paul, nor any other man, under the dictation of the Spirit of God, ever expressed the idea that it was a blessing to die. Death is the great curse resting on the race of Adam. Christ, the second Adam, came to redeem us from this curse; and in doing it he was "made a curse for us:" see Gal. iii. 13. Jesus died, came under the curse—"that he might redeem us from the curse of the law" —which was death. This redemption is not attained till the resurrection. If Paul had died, and been conscious after he was dead, he would not have "been with Christ" in that state, for Christ our High Priest has gone "into the holy place, the holiest of all"—"into heaven itself, now to appear in the presence of God for us;" see Heb. ix. 8, 12, 24. In that place the "high priest went alone," and "no man" was permitted to be present or enter there while the "High Priest" continued to occupy that position. Compare Lev. xvi. 17, with Heb. ix. 7 to the end of the chapter, and we shall see that the idea of dead saints entering "into heaven itself"—to "be with Christ" there—is anti-scriptural, and the height of presumption; Paul had no such idea, nor did he express such an one.

Whatever his "desire" might be, he had no expectation of such an occurrence; and therefore had no such hope: for desire and expectation must be combined to make hope. "The dying Christian" therefore does not "look in faith" for such an event. The "traditions of men" may have led the dying Christian to expect an immediate entrance "into heaven itself" at death; and so many have been led by like traditions to expect they should take Purgatory on their way; and one has just as much foundation in truth as the other. The Bible teaches no such doctrine as either. Not one solitary promise is there found from Gen. to Rev. that any man shall enter into heaven at death. That the Christian may look for "an immediate union with Jesus," when dying, we can admit, though not in the sense of "B." The period from death to the resurrection, to the dead, is no more than the tick of a watch: time to them is annihilated. To them the moment of their death is the instant of their resurrection. In this there is nothing "repulsive" to the well instructed Christian: far otherwise. The notion of a fancied something, called the soul, floating somewhere in undefined regions, without any substantial form, and living thousands of years, doing they know not what, or waiting to be again "reunited" to the body it cast off, and which the living are taught to believe is an incumbrence, is no "comfort" to an intelligent Christian, but is the very thing, of all others, that might fitly be accounted "repulsive." Such a halfway house, or residence, where all the sorrows and sufferings of friends and fellow Christians left behind would be witnessed for years or centuries, has no charms in it, to say nothing of its unscriptural character.

But "blindness in part has happened unto Israel till the fulness of the Gentiles be come in;" and nothing has contributed to the blindness of professed Christians so much as the notion of a distinct, immortal entity in man, called "the soul." This has turned off their eyes from the glory and importance of the resurrection; and just in that proportion, made them lose sight of Christ as a Life-giver; thus suppressing both the desire and love of his appearing Paul makes an important characteristic of those who are to receive a crown from the Lord, the righteous judge at that day. See 2 Tim. iv. 1, 8. Thus by the theory of natural immortality Christ is both robbed and dishonored; while man is filled with the serpent pride—"Ye shall be as God's;" only the serpent lie is improved on by affirming "Ye cannot die, ye are God's—as immortal as God himself." Such is the blasphemous result of "B's" theory.

Information Wanted.

1. How can you harmonize Rev. x. 6–7; xi. 15–18; 1 Thes. iv. 15, 16, 17, with the idea of Christ's coming a thousand years before the conflagration; as it is said, that at the beginning of the seventh trumpet, the mystery of God shall be finished: and time is to be no more; the time of the dead that they should be judged, and the wicked destroyed?

2. How do you reconcile James's exposition of Amos ix. 11, that the tabernacle of David was built at that time, as he quoted the text to prove that the Gentiles had a right to the privileges of the church, with the idea that it shall not be built till the second advent? B.

Response by the Editor.—To question "1," we reply—Nothing is said in either of the texts referred to, of the "conflagration." As to the "mystery of God," we might ask, what is it? and, how is it to be finished? The mystery—or secret—seems to be something which was hidden or sealed up, but is now to be opened: it was something "announced to the prophets." It is quite likely that Daniel is specially referred to. Daniel was directed to "shut up the words and seal the book, to the time of the end:" chap. xii. 4. At the time spoken of, John sees an angel come down from heaven who "had in his hand a little book open." The "time" for which the book had been sealed by Daniel, one of "the prophets," should continue no longer; the mystery, or secret was now to be unfolded; and of course, the darkness which hung over the prophecy, while sealed, was now to end or be finished. And this was as God had "declared" it should be; for, he had said, in the same verse, Dan. xii. 4, "Many shall run to and fro, and knowledge shall be increased," at "the time of the end" of the sealing of the book

Whether this be the true view or not, the work was to be "finished as God hath declared to his servants the prophets." So that we are to examine how it is to be done according to the testimony of the prophets. There we shall find clearly revealed that it is to be finished by a reign of Prince Messiah on the earth, under circumstances, and in a time, that never has yet been realized. As to the end of time, in the popular sense of that term, there is no such doctrine in the Bible; it is purely of human invention—an attach to "immortal soul;" neither having any foundation in the testimony of God.

The judgment of the dead, at the advent of Christ, does not import that all the dead will have a resurrection. It does, indeed, import the resurrection of God's "saints;" because then they are to be rewarded; and the destruction of them that destroy the earth may import no more than the cutting off of wicked oppressors alive at that time, as expressed Psa. lxxii, "He shall break in pieces the oppressor....he shall spare the poor and needy," etc.; see the whole of that Psalm.

To the "2nd" inquiry, we say—We do not understand James as asserting "that the tabernacle of David was built at that time," &c. His quoting the text in Amos ix. 11, "to prove that the Gentiles had a right to the privilege of the church," no more proves that the tabernacle of David was built at that time, than Peter's quoting Joel ii. 28–32, proves that all the "great and terrible" events embraced in the quotation were fulfilled at that time; see Acts ii. 16–20. Peter quotes that prophecy for a specific purpose, viz.: to prove that God had promised an unusual outpouring of the Spirit in the last days—that what was now witnessed was in agreement with prophecy, though all embraced in the prophecy did not then transpire; and much of it was then far in the future. So James, Acts xv. 14–17 quotes from Amos to show an "agreement" in the "words of the prophets," with the facts just stated by Paul, Barnabas, and Simeon, that God was, at that time, "visiting the Gentiles, to take out of them a people for his name." In quoting the prophets in justification of the work then going on among the Gentiles, James, like Peter in Acts ii., quotes much in connection, without affirming the then actual fulfilment of all said in that prophecy. His purpose was to show that God had clearly expressed his will, by the prophets, that the Gentiles should be made partakers of the blessings conferred through the Messiah: much of the prophecy remaining to be fulfilled at a future period.

That the Tabernacle of David cannot be built till the second advent of Messiah, appears clear to our mind, from the fact, that its rebuilding imports the re-establishment of David's throne, which has been overturned, and is to remain in that condition "till he come whose right it is," to whom God has promised it, and confirmed that promise with an oath.

Ignorance.—We have found persons, members of churches, who seemed as totally ignorant of the Scriptures as the Pagans. They do not pretend to read the Old Testament, but regard it as something that does not at all concern them; and as to the New, they think it presumption to attempt to understand it—that is a matter to be left to their minister: their church creed is the standard of their appeal, and they have no faith in the resurrection of the dead: they regard it as folly to talk of any such thing. They imagine their immortal souls are to receive some kind of vehicle which will answer the purpose of a body, but no resurrection. This is the legitimate fruit of the inherent immortality theory: it is making infidels of church members. Their teachers may cry, of our preaching, "infidelity," as much as they please; the fact is, they are leading or driving the members of their churches directly into the blackest infidelity; and unless they change their preaching, they will find their flocks swept away with the rising stream of atheism and infidelity that threatens to overwhelm Christendom. We sincerely pity the poor sheep who have so long been fed or starved on the theory of inherent immortality and its legitimate offsprings —going to heaven at death, and no resurrection.

A Trouble.—"I have a trouble about the identity of the raised. As you hold, it seems a new creation after the old type, and there could be two or ten thousand 'raised' as properly from the same type and identity. Can you throw light on this troublesome (not to me alone) point?"

The foregoing trouble makes us think of Nicodemus, who said, "How can these things be?" and of Paul's remark, "Some man will say, How are the dead raised up, and with what body do they [the dead] come?" Do such persons not "Err, not knowing the Scriptures nor the power of God?" No man can have more than one "identity." That he must have in the resurrection, or it is no resurrection at all. The word and truth of God are pledged to raise up the dead in Christ, "at the last day. Has God said it, and can He do it?" Only admit His omnipotence, and be satisfied that he has promised it, and faith will find no fears left of being raised "ten thousand" instead of the same one and identical person who fell asleep. If our troubled friend wishes us to go into philosophical speculations on the matter, we must leave that to the disbelievers in God's power, who have supplied an immortal soul as an excuse for their unbelief.

Otto, Fulton Co., Ill., July 10, 1865.

We have just obtained Br. Leet's letter, stating that a tent is on the way for us. This has really gladdened our hearts. It is what we need. I trust we may find it very useful in work which we are called to perform. We are making some progress in bringing the light of immortality before the thought of the people of this county. Where we can get the people to think we can succeed in making converts to the faith and hope of the gospel, and it does appear that if we can not get people into the faith of the gospel, we do them but little good. There are many sects—many isms—much that will lead people to act in respect to this world, supposing, it may be, that thus, they are acting for the world to come; but only true faith in God will lead to a preparation for the world to come. Now, while we conclude that charity is a Christian virtue and duty, we believe that, really, the more sectarian a man is the less charity he will possess.

We believe, also, that it is a duty to believe what God has revealed. It is trifling with the work of God, his more important work of Redemption, to discredit what he has revealed, or lightly esteem what he has declared.

Again, it becomes sinful to conclude, as some will, that it makes no difference what we believe, so that we do what is about right. Or, again, to blow away about preaching doctrine as if practical preaching, so called, were designed to save men. As if there were any preaching without doctrine! All the rest is lecturing, exhorting, talk:—sometimes the merest twaddle. I admire the sentiment that is referred to Bishop Whately, that "the preaching that is without divine doctrine is no better than the moralizing of heathen philosophers."

What would become of the gospel, in the world, if it were not believed? And how would it ever be believed if only these preached it? The great trouble is that it has not been deemed important to believe the truth. It is thought to be necessary to believe something that will bring men into the church, and to feel a motive that will keep them there, and hence, the vast proportion either believe the construction, never looking for themselves, or they believe nothing at all. The greatest mistakes, should, therefore, be the necessary consequence. Stupendous errors are found in the church because they are found in men's minds, and hence, men believing, they know not what, will soon come to "worship, they know not what." I appeal to the candid, if it is not important to believe the doctrine of God, our Saviour, that we may know how to "worship acceptably"? Talk not to me, then, about the small consequence of faith in the real doctrine of scripture, or the virtue of doing something to worship, till you know what to do, which is to apprehend and appreciate the ground of faith; for faith just stands on evidence; and without it we cannot please God.

The great call to men upon the presentation of divine truth, the preaching of the gospel—is to believe. Believe: sweetly says the voice of reconciliation. Believe: urge the arguments of the gospel, coming with philosophical clearness upon the understanding that is open to conviction. Believe: thunders the waiting ministration, clothed with authority, as well as love; believe, lest the Life-giver is angry with the treatment of his beneficent plan, and your light sink in darkness! Believe! and here lies the great secret of the foundation, as laid for us. It is laid in Zion, "He that believeth shall not make haste." He will know where he stands. The rock will never move. He will stand upon it by his confidence.

The secret of our connection with Christ is faith in the truth which he, in the gospel, has enunciated. Thus coming, thus near we come to him, and the spiritual truly begins—"To know him is life enternal." Unbelief is condemnation. "But must a man believe all you do, to be saved?" I did not say that. Some will be required to believe more than they do now to exemplify the spirit and power of the gospel; let them do what they may. Probably, a man who has seen advanced truth, would not be justified, fully, to believe less. "Oh, we get them forward: you may theorize: we will talk practically and get them to Christ." True gospel theory, in the spirit and fear of Christ, is practical and full. The life and hope of the future, are true ground; embracing the terrors of the law of God, in a view that is reasonable: and hence, the plan, in a perfect and complete manifestation, comes to save those who believe; for it is to them, the power of God and the wisdom of God.

"But see how many were led to come forward and profess faith, and we did not preach doctrine. Oh, we urged them to come right along!" And did they come? And what kind of Christians were they? Did the stream rise above the fountain? Could they prove any better than the stocks to which they belonged? Does not the begetting always qualify the childship? And does not the word say that the word (applied by faith) is the begetting? How do they stand now? How many, that are reported converted by such means, are never to be found as afterwards faithful disciples, and consistent, intelligent Christians? "Degenerate plants of a strange vine!" You cannot hybrid Christ with Satan; if you seem to see a sickly flower you find no product. That true vine is a grape that never buds into the old, wild, tangled errors of the vine of earth! Make the tree good. "I am the true vine." Graft them into him.

One is reminded of the fable of the lioness and the cat. Pussy boasted of the number of her progeny, and was told by the other proud mother, that they were only cats. "But see how many I have, while you have but two," said puss. "But mine," replied the lioness, "are lions." When we see so much parade over converts that are professedly made without material, what can we expect of the product but that it will soon disappear? We see the old nature excited to act strangely, for a moment, then go back.

There may be more importance attached to these things than some people imagine. Error will seed and grow wherever it is left, and in every direction it springs up. The truth must be planted and cultivated to show a harvest. Then let us be assiduous in the application of the forces which God has committed to our charge, that we see, in the end, good wheat, grown under the power of the principles of salvation He has left us.

We fully believe, we have gained somewhat, in the work, by the meeting last Sunday. We had a better hearing than we expected. May the Lord give the word power and success. Amen.

A Few Words Upon John vi. 39.

BY ELD. F. H. BURBANK.

"And this is the Father's will which hath sent me, that of all which he hath given me I should lose nothing, but should raise it up again at the last day."

My attention was called to this text by Br. Wendell's article in this week's Herald, replying to Br. Seymour's exposition. I think, with Br. W., that the verses following the 39th, gives the correct exposition. In addition, to make a stronghold stronger, I will quote a few words from the Saviour's prayer to his Father, as recorded in John xvii. from the 6th verse, and onward.

"I have manifested thy name unto the men which thou gavest me out of the world; thine they were, and thou gavest them me; and they have kept thy word....I pray for them: I pray not for the world, but for them which thou hast given me....While I was with them in the world, I kept them in thy name; those that thou gavest me I have kept, and none of them is lost, but the son of perdition; (Judas) that the scripture might be fulfilled." "And this is the will of him that sent me, that every one that seeth the Son, and believeth on him, may have everlasting life: and I will raise him up at the last day."

Yours, searching the Scriptures.

The Cities of the Plain.

BY F. H. BURBANK.

Message of the angels to Lot. "We will destroy this place, because the cry of them is waxen great before the face of the Lord; and the Lord hath sent us to destroy it." Gen. xix. 13.

"Then the Lord rained upon Sodom and Gomorrah brimstone and fire from the Lord out of heaven; and he overthrew those cities, and all the plain, and all the inhabitants of the cities, and that which grew upon the ground." Gen. xix. 24, 25.

The thirteenth verse is the threatening; the others, contain the fulfilment, or execution of the penalty. The cause of this terrible judgment, was the grevious sin of all the inhabitants, there not being ten righteous persons there.

All of the foregoing teaches that all those persons are destroyed, and eternally destroyed; hence, they can never have a resurrection. Peter says, in his 2 Ep. ii. 6, "Turning the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah into ashes, condemned them with an overthrow, making them an ensample unto those that after should live ungodly." Jude says, in the seventh verse of his epistle, "Even as Sodom and Gomorrah and the cities about them....are set forth for an example, suffering the vengeance of eternal fire." Christ says, Luke xvii. 29, 30, "But the same day that Lot went out of Sodom, it rained fire and brimstone from heaven, and destroyed them all; even thus shall it be in the day when the Son of man is (shall be) revealed."

There are several self-evident truths in connection with this subject. One is: the inhabitants of those cities did not die "the Adamic death," or "the first death," as some express it, (though such phrases are not to be found in the Bible) for Adam did not die by fire and brimstone."

Another: They died for their own sins. They had long been great sinners, and Jehovah's "goodness," "longsuffering," and forbearance, alone, had suspended the execution of his fierce anger upon them.

Another: As the end of the wicked is destruction, those cities have been visited with the threatened doom. They suffered destruction by "eternal fire; hence their destruction is an eternal destruction.

Finally, having been destroyed for their own sins, there is no necessity for their being raised again from the dead. A man cannot die a "second death" twice. If they have not suffered the penalty threatened, then the "example" amounts to nothing, and we are no wiser than before we read their history.

There is a passage in Matt. x. 15 which seems to contradict such conclusions. Christ had given instructions to his twelve apostles who were going out to preach the gospel, and says in that verse concerning those who would not receive them, "It shall be more tolerable for the land of Sodom and Gomorrah in the day of judgment than for that city."

Wakefield's translation of this verse reads, "Verily I say unto you it will be more tolera-

(some of whom, have been executed before;) a substitutionary sacrifice; a thousand years of binding of a literal satan; (in what kind of a pit?) the burning of the wicked on the New Earth; and the different set theories on prophecy: all of these, by one and another, and all around, and you never occupy the hobby seat! You might publish on eclipses in the attempt by astronomical science to establish a speculative bible point, from now till the end of time, and you would not then behold the beam that is in your eye. Now, some men seem to be growing old, for they join in the hue-and-cry of the children about "hobbies"—when they mean heresy; but know well, if they say that, they can be handled and dissected by this sword of truth. Let us have the same privelege which you claim for yourselves, and if you are not as greatly at fault as we, then hobby is not hobby.

Consistency, thou art an ancient jewel!

Another Discovery at Jerusalem.

Everthing connected with the Holy City is of interest. We therefore gladly print the following which is extracted from a letter of the Rev. W. Baily, one of our missionaries at that station: "You will, perhaps, remember that nearly three years ago there was much said and written about the discovery of a spring near arch Ecce Homo. The Jews in particular flocked in great numbers to see it, until they were prevented by the Latins, who claimed it as their property. The Jews believed that the finding of this spring indicated that important events were nigh at hand, as one of their tradition says that 'previous to Messiah's appearance fountains and springs of water will be found in Jerusalem. Not believing this could be a spring, I did not at that time go see it; but last week I accompanied Dr. Chaplain and three or four others to examine it and a subterranean passage discovered at the same time by Mr. Picrotti, and I was not a little surprised to find it to be a veritable spring. There is a good body of water nearly two yards broad, four yards long, and about five feet deep. The water is somewhat blackish, similiar to that of Siloam, and it remains the same height throughout the year. The passage at the commencement of which lies this spring is certainly a very remarkable one, and of considerable size, so that it must surely have been something more than a sewer, as some have imagined, for it is well built, and is I should think, full twelve feet wide, and as about as many high, upwards of twenty-five yards of it have been explored, but not cleared, as it is still half filled with earth and rubbish. Some suppose it runs down from this point, the Ecce Homo Arch, to the site of the temple. On ascending the steps leading down to the spring, we were led aside, when half way up, and shown a substantial diece of old pavement which appeared to run onward beneath the foundation of the house; we were told these stones were a part of the pavement of the Via Dildrosa, immediately beneath the Ecce Homo Arch. They certainly bear marks of great antiquity, and I could not help feeling that it was very probable it was a part of that very pavement which our Saviour Himself had often trod. I must say that it is one of the most interesting things I have seen here. The school and Hospital of the Sisters of Zion are built over this site; two of the nuns very kindly conducted us over their building before taking us down to the spring, &c. They have a similiar establishment to that of the German Deaconesses—viz., a Girl's Boarding and Day school, and a Hospital for the reception of all persons, of any creed, who may apply for entrance. In the school we found about twenty healthy looking, clean, and neatly dressed girls, who appeared very cheerful and happy. French and Arabic appear the principal languages taught; they sung at our request a verse or two of a French hymn. I thought the whole establishment a superior one in arrangement and appearance; the largest and best in the city. Several English travelers I find, have visited it this year; amongst the number are Lady Herbert, her family and suite. We rejoice to day to have very evident signs of abundance of rain; there has been a long and serious drought and the showers now will indeed be a great blessing, not only in doing good to the parched ground and corn, but also in driving away the agues and fevers which a great many people are now beginning to suffer from."—Israelite Indeed.

The Graces: How Obtained.

Bro. Storrs:—The following extract from "Beecher's Life Thoughts," has so much truthfulness in it, and is so well calculated to correct the false impression many entertain in regard to the subject of which it treats, that I feel inclined to copy it for the benefit of those who have never read it. L. J. Beach.

Many people seem to imagine that God keeps a gracious apothecary's shop above, with faith, and meekness and humility, put up in bottles ready for purchasers; and as they could go into a perfumer's here below, and ask for this or that extract, so they can go to God and ask for this or that grace. Christian graces can never be obtained in this way. They must be the outgrowth of life. The prayer for graces will be answered; but God will make us work out each one with fear and trembling. The spire that almost touches the stars, does not rise isolated from the ground; beneath it and supporting it, is the massy substructure,—the cathedral of stone. So faith cannot soar to heaven alone; it must be the steeple and the spire of the whole life building."

The Herald of Life.

NEW YORK, JULY 19, 1865.

NO IMMORTALITY NOR FUTURE LIFE, EXCEPT IN JESUS CHRIST ALONE, AND BY A RESURRECTION AT THE LAST DAY IF DEAD, OR A CHANGE IF ALIVE.

Curious Logic.

"The annihilation of the wicked is repulsive to the Christian. What comfort can there be to the dying Christian, in the idea that he is going to lie dormant until the resurrection: The very thought is repulsive. Paul said, 'I desire to depart, and to be with Christ, which is far better.' Can any one suppose that he believed that he should cease to exist? His desire was to be with Christ. And he evidently anticipated that he should be with him when he died. Can it be pretended that Stephen anticipated a fatal extinction of being, when he saw the heavens opened, and the Son of man on the right hand of God, and prayed, 'Lord Jesus, receive my spirit?' No. The dying Christian looks in faith, for an immediate union with Jesus. B."

This beats all the arguments ever urged by a "Christian!" The annihilation of the wicked "is repulsive to the Christian!" therefore, the wicked must be kept eternally alive in undescribable sufferings, cursing God and the Lamb! There is nothing repulsive in that, to such Christians as "B," it seems. Well, we do not envy him his sensibilities. Strange indeed that "B" should offer such an "objection" to "the annihilation of the wicked!" He must have forgotten what he was attempting to do, and so confounded the "state of the dead" with the subject of his discourse, or being barren of argument, threw in this "objection" to draw off attention, so that he might stir the "repulsive" feelings of Christians; who, it seems, he thinks, would much rather some unconverted wife, husband, father, brother, sister, mother, or child, would suffer the endless torment of fire and brimstone, and live to curse God and his Christ eternally, than that "the Christian" should sleep quietly from death to "the resurrection!"

But as "B" has left his text—"the annihilation of the wicked"—to preach a short sermon on the state of the dead, we will notice the sermon, though out of place. Will "B" tell us if it is "repulsive" to a "Christian" to die? That is, Is it generally so? Or, do they covet death? Do not tell us that some die triumphatly: that we know and admit. But is death that which Christians covet? or do they show the same desire to protract life as others, and use the same means for that end? If so, then death, itself, is "repulsive to the Christian." Because it is so, is that an argument to prove they do not and will not die! Just as good, and as forcible as that of "B," that they will not "lie dormant," or sleep "till the resurrection." The fact is, our Lord made his followers no promise that they should be with him at death; but he did promise again and again, "I will raise him up at the last day:" see John vi. 39, 40, 44, 54. It was the resurrection at Christ's return "from heaven" that was the great theme of comfort to the New Testament saints, and not an imaginary "going to heaven at death." No such expression ever occurs in the teaching of Christ or his apostles. On the contrary, Paul himself expressly declares—"If the dead rise not, then is not Christ raised;....then they also which are fallen asleep in Christ are perished;" and "If after the manner of men I have fought with beasts at Ephesus, what advantageth it me, if the dead rise not?" see 1 Corth. xv. 16–18, 32; and Peter declares, on the day of Pentecost while speaking under the immediate influence of the Holy Spirit, "David is not ascended into the heavens;" though he had been dead several hundred years. Old and New Testament saints all deprecate death as something "repulsive" and undesirable; and not one of the New Testament saints express the desire to die; but speak of it as just the reverse, though they sustain themselves in view of it by the hope of Christ's return from heaven and the resurrection at that day. Paul thus speaks, 2 Corth. i. 8–10, "We despaired even of life: but we had the sentence of death in ourselves, that we should not trust in ourselves, but in God which raiseth the dead: who delivered us from so great a death," &c. We see here in what light Paul viewed death, and that the only sustaining hope in view of it was that God would raise him from the dead.

In the Epistle from which "B" has quoted Paul's "desire," that apostle speaks of death on this wise—"Epaphroditus was sick nigh unto death; but God had mercy on him," &c., chap. ii. 25–27. Now, did Paul in one and the same Epistle tell the Philippians that he himself desired to die, and that it was a mercy in God not to let Epaphroditus die? Was Paul so selfish as to wish for himself death, and would esteem it "far better" to die than to live, and yet unwilling that his brother, Epaphroditus, should share with him in the bliss of being dead? and say, that "God had mercy on him" and would not let him die? Was Paul the Apostle such a man? Was he such a stupid being as to pronounce it "far better" to die in one breath, and in the next, to affirm it was God's mercy to Epaphroditus that he did not die?

Whatever Paul meant by the term "depart"—quoted by "B"—he did not mean by it, "to die:" for Paul, nor any other man, under the dictation of the Spirit of God, ever expressed the idea that it was a blessing to die. Death is the great curse resting on the race of Adam. Christ, the second Adam, came to redeem us from this curse; and in doing it he was "made a curse for us:" see Gal. iii. 13. Jesus died, came under the curse—"that he might redeem us from the curse of the law"—which was death. This redemption is not attained till the resurrection. If Paul had died, and been conscious after he was dead, he would not have "been with Christ" in that state, for Christ our High Priest has gone "into the holy place, the holiest of all"—"into heaven itself, now to appear in the presence of God for us;" see Heb. ix. 8, 12, 24. In that place the "high priest went alone," and "no man" was permitted to be present or enter there while the "High Priest" continued to occupy that position. Compare Lev. xvi. 17, with Heb. ix. 7 to the end of the chapter, and we shall see that the idea of dead saints entering "into heaven itself"—to "be with Christ" there—is anti-scriptural, and the height of presumption; Paul had no such idea, nor did he express such an one.

Whatever his "desire" might be, he had no expectation of such an occurrence; and therefore had no such hope: for desire and expectation must be combined to make hope. "The dying Christian" therefore does not "look in faith" for such an event. The "traditions of men" may have led the dying Christian to expect an immediate entrance "into heaven itself" at death; and so many have been led by like traditions to expect they should take Purgatory on their way; and one has just as much foundation in truth as the other. The Bible teaches no such doctrine as either. Not one solitary promise is there found from Gen. to Rev. that any man shall enter into heaven at death. That the Christian may look for "an immediate union with Jesus," when dying, we can admit, though not in the sense of "B." The period from death to the resurrection, to the dead, is no more than the tick of a watch: time to them is annihilated. To them the moment of their death is the instant of their resurrection. In this there is nothing "repulsive" to the well instructed Christian: far otherwise. The notion of a fancied something, called the soul, floating somewhere in undefined regions, without any substantial form, and living thousands of years, doing they know not what, or waiting to be again "reunited" to the body it cast off, and which the living are taught to believe is an incumbrance, is no "comfort" to an intelligent Christian, but is the very thing, of all others, that might fitly be accounted "repulsive." Such a halfway house, or residence, where all the sorrows and sufferings of friends and fellow Christians left behind would be witnessed for years or centuries, has no charms in it, to say nothing of its unscriptural character.

But "blindness in part has happened unto Israel till the fulness of the Gentiles be come in;" and nothing has contributed to the blindness of professed Christians so much as the notion of a distinct, immortal entity in man, called "the soul." This has turned off their eyes from the glory and importance of the resurrection; and just in that proportion, made them lose sight of Christ as a Life-giver; thus suppressing both the desire and love of his appearing Paul makes an important characteristic of those who are to receive a crown from the Lord, the righteous judge at that day. See 2 Tim. iv. 1, 8. Thus by the theory of natural immortality Christ is both robbed and dishonored; while man is filled with the serpent pride—"Ye shall be as God's;" only the serpent lie is improved on by affirming "Ye cannot die, ye are God's—as immortal as God himself." Such is the blasphemous result of "B's" theory.

Information Wanted.

1. How can you harmonize Rev. x. 6–7; xi. 15–18; 1 Thes. iv. 15, 16, 17, with the idea of Christ's coming a thousand years before the conflagration; as it is said, that at the beginning of the seventh trumpet, the mystery of God shall be finished: and time is to be no more; the time of the dead that they should be judged, and the wicked destroyed?

2. How do you reconcile James's exposition of Amos ix. 11, that the tabernacle of David was built at that time, as he quoted the text to prove that the Gentiles had a right to the privileges of the church, with the idea that it shall not be built till the second advent? B.

Response by the Editor.—To question "1," we reply—Nothing is said in either of the texts referred to, of the "conflagration." As to the "mystery of God," we might ask, what is it? and, how is it to be finished? The mystery—or secret—seems to be something which was hidden or sealed up, but is now to be opened: it was something "announced to the prophets." It is quite likely that Daniel is specially referred to. Daniel was directed to "shut up the words and seal the book, to the time of the end:", chap. xii. 4. At the time spoken of, John sees an angel come down from heaven who "had in his hand a little book open." The "time" for which the book had been sealed by Daniel, one of "the prophets," should continue no longer; the mystery, or secret was now to be unfolded; and of course, the darkness which hung over the prophecy, while sealed, was now to end or be finished. And this was as God had "declared" it should be; for, he had said, in the same verse, Dan. xii. 4, "Many shall run to and fro, and knowledge shall be increased," at "the time of the end" of the sealing of the book

Whether this be the true view or not, the work was to be "finished as God hath declared to his servants the prophets." So that we are to examine how it is to be done according to the testimony of the prophets. There we shall find clearly revealed that it is to be finished by a reign of Prince Messiah on the earth, under circumstances, and in a time, that never has yet been realized. As to the end of time, in the popular sense of that term, there is no such doctrine in the Bible: it is purely of human invention—an attach to "immortal soul;" neither having any foundation in the testimony of God.

The judgment of the dead, at the advent of Christ, does not import that all the dead will have a resurrection. It does, indeed, import the resurrection of God's "saints;" because then they are to be rewarded; and the destruction of them that destroy the earth may import no more than the cutting off of wicked oppressors alive at that time, as expressed Psa. lxxii, "He shall break in pieces the oppressor....he shall spare the poor and needy," etc.; see the whole of that Psalm.

To the "2nd" inquiry, we say—We do not understand James as asserting "that the tabernacle of David was built at that time," &c. His quoting the text in Amos ix. 11, "to prove that the Gentiles had a right to the privilege of the church," no more proves that the tabernacle of David was built at that time, than Peter's quoting Joel ii. 28–32, proves that all the "great and terrible" events embraced in the quotation were fulfilled at that time; see Acts ii. 16–20. Peter quotes that prophecy for a specific purpose, viz.: to prove that God had promised an unusual outpouring of the Spirit in the last days—that what was now witnessed was in agreement with prophecy, though all embraced in the prophecy did not then transpire; and much of it was then far in the future. So James, Acts xv. 14–17 quotes from Amos to show an "agreement" in the "words of the prophets," with the facts just stated by Paul, Barnabas, and Simeon, that God was, at that time, "visiting the Gentiles, to take out of them a people for his name." In quoting the prophets in justification of the work then going on among the Gentiles, James, like Peter in Acts ii., quotes much in connection, without affirming the then actual fulfilment of all said in that prophecy. His purpose was to show that God had clearly expressed his will, by the prophets, that the Gentiles should be made partakers of the blessings conferred through the Messiah: much of the prophecy remaining to be fulfilled at a future period.

That the Tabernacle of David cannot be built till the second advent of Messiah, appears clear to our mind, from the fact, that its rebuilding imports the re-establishment of David's throne, which has been overturned, and is to remain in that condition "till he come whose right it is," to whom God has promised it, and confirmed that promise with an oath.

Ignorance.—We have found persons, members of churches, who seemed as totally ignorant of the Scriptures as the Pagans. They do not pretend to read the Old Testament, but regard it as something that does not at all concern them; and as to the New, they think it presumption to attempt to understand it—that is a matter to be left to their minister: their church creed is the standard of their appeal, and they have no faith in the resurrection of the dead: they regard it as folly to talk of any such thing. They imagine their immortal souls are to receive some kind of vehicle which will answer the purpose of a body, but no resurrection. This is the legitimate fruit of the inherent immortality theory: it is making infidels of church members. Their teachers may cry, of our preaching, "infidelity," as much as they please; the fact is, they are leading or driving the members of their churches directly into the blackest infidelity; and unless they change their preaching, they will find their flocks swept away with the rising stream of atheism and infidelity that threatens to overwhelm Christendom. We sincerely pity the poor sheep who have so long been fed or starved on the theory of inherent immortality and its legitimate offsprings—going to heaven at death, and no resurrection.

A Trouble.—"I have a trouble about the identity of the raised. As you hold, it seems a new creation after the old type, and there could be two or ten thousand 'raised' as properly from the same type and identity. Can you throw light on this troublesome (not to me alone) point?"

The foregoing trouble makes us think of Nicodemus, who said, "How can these things be?" and of Paul's remark, "Some man will say, How are the dead raised up, and with what body do they [the dead] come?" Do such persons not "Err, not knowing the Scriptures nor the power of God?" No man can have more than one "identity." That he must have in the resurrection, or it is no resurrection at all. The word and truth of God are pledged to raise up the dead in Christ, "at the last day. Has God said it, and can He do it?" Only admit His omnipotence, and be satisfied that he has promised it, and faith will find no fears left of being raised "ten thousand" instead of the same one and identical person who fell asleep. If our troubled friend wishes us to go into philosophical speculations on the matter, we must leave that to the disbelievers in God's power, who have supplied an immortal soul as an excuse for their unbelief.

Otto, Fulton Co., Ill., July 10, 1865.

We have just obtained Br. Leet's letter, stating that a tent is on the way for us. This has really gladdened our hearts. It is what we need. I trust we may find it very useful in work which we are called to perform. We are making some progress in bringing the light of immortality before the thought of the people of this county. Where we can get the people to think we can succeed in making converts to the faith and hope of the gospel, and it does appear that if we can not get people into the faith of the gospel, we do them but little good. There are many sects—many isms—much that will lead people to act in respect to this world, supposing, it may be, that thus, they are acting for the world to come; but only true faith in God will lead to a preparation for the world to come. Now, while we conclude that charity is a Christian virtue and duty, we believe that, really, the more sectarian a man is the less charity he will possess.

We believe, also, that it is a duty to believe what God has revealed. It is trifling with the work of God, his more important work of Redemption, to discredit what he has revealed, or lightly esteem what he has declared.

Again, it becomes sinful to conclude, as some will, that it makes no difference what we believe, so that we do what is about right. Or, again, to blow away about preaching doctrine as if practical preaching, so called, were designed to save men. As if there were any preaching without doctrine! All the rest is lecturing, exhorting, talk—sometimes the merest twaddle. I admire the sentiment that is referred to Bishop Whately, that "the preaching that is without divine doctrine is no better than the moralizing of heathen philosophers."

What would become of the gospel, in the world, if it were not believed? And how would it ever be believed if only these preached it? The great trouble is that it has not been deemed important to believe the truth. It is thought to be necessary to believe something that will bring men into the church, and to feel a motive that will keep them there, and hence, the vast proportion either believe the construction, never looking for themselves, or they believe nothing at all. The greatest mistakes, should, therefore, be the necessary consequence. Stupendous errors are found in the church because they are found in men's minds, and hence, men believing, they know not what, will soon come to "worship, they know not what." I appeal to the candid, if it is not important to believe the doctrine of God, our Saviour, that we may know how to "worship acceptably"? Talk not to me, then, about the small consequence of faith in the real doctrine of scripture, or the virtue of doing something to worship, till you know what to do, which is to apprehend and appreciate the ground of faith; for faith just stands on evidence; and without it we cannot please God.

The great call to men upon the presentation of divine truth, the preaching of the gospel—is to believe. Believe: sweetly says the voice of reconciliation. Believe: urge the arguments of the gospel, coming with philosophical clearness upon the understanding that is open to conviction. Believe: thunders the waiting ministration, clothed with authority, as well as love; believe, lest the Life-giver is angry with the treatment of his beneficent plan, and your light sink in darkness! Believe! and here lies the great secret of the foundation, as laid for us. It is laid in Zion, "He that believeth shall not make haste." He will know where he stands. The rock will never move. He will stand upon it by his confidence.

The secret of our connection with Christ is faith in the truth which he, in the gospel, has enunciated. Thus coming, thus near we come to him, and the spiritual truly begins—"To know him is life enternal." Unbelief is condemnation. "But must a man believe all you do, to be saved?" I did not say that. Some will be required to believe more than they do now to exemplify the spirit and power of the gospel; let them do what they may. Probably, a man who has seen advanced truth, would not be justified, fully, to believe less. "Oh, we get them forward: you may theorize: we will talk practically and get them to Christ." True gospel theory, in the spirit and fear of Christ, is practical and full. The life and hope of the future, are true ground; embracing the terrors of the law of God, in a view that is reasonable: and hence, the plan, in a perfect and complete manifestation, comes to save those who believe; for it is to them, the power of God and the wisdom of God.

"But see how many were led to come forward and profess faith, and we did not preach doctrine. Oh, we urged them to come right along!" And did they come? And what kind of Christians were they? Did the stream rise above the fountain? Could they prove any better than the stocks to which they belonged? Does not the begetting always qualify the childship? And does not the word say that the word (applied by faith) is the begetting? How do they stand now? How many, that are reported converted by such means, are never to be found as afterwards faithful disciples, and consistent, intelligent Christians? "Degenerate plants of a strange vine!" You cannot hybrid Christ with Satan; if you seem to see a sickly flower you find no product. That true vine is a grape that never buds into the old, wild, tangled errors of the vine of earth! Make the tree good. "I am the true vine." Graft them into him.

One is reminded of the fable of the lioness and the cat. Pussy boasted of the number of her progeny, and was told by the other proud mother, that they were only cats. "But see how many I have, while you have but two," said puss. "But mine," replied the lioness, "are lions." When we see so much parade over converts that are professedly made without material, what can we expect of the product but that it will soon disappear? We see the old nature excited to act strangely, for a moment, then go back.

There may be more importance attached to these things than some people imagine. Error will seed and grow wherever it is left, and in every direction it springs up. The truth must be planted and cultivated to show a harvest. Then let us be assiduous in the application of the forces which God has committed to our charge, that we see, in the end, good wheat, grown under the power of the principles of salvation He has left us.

We fully believe, we have gained somewhat, in the work, by the meeting last Sunday. We had a better hearing than we expected. May the Lord give the word power and success. Amen.

A Few Words Upon John vi. 39.

BY ELD. F. H. BURBANK.

"And this is the Father's will which hath sent me, that of all which he hath given me I should lose nothing, but should raise it up again at the last day."

My attention was called to this text by Br. Wendell's article in this week's Herald, replying to Br. Seymour's exposition. I think, with Br. W., that the verses following the 39th, gives the correct exposition. In addition, to make a stronghold stronger, I will quote a few words from the Saviour's prayer to his Father, as recorded in John xvii. from the 6th verse, and onward.

"I have manifested thy name unto the men which thou gavest me out of the world; thine they were, and thou gavest them me; and they have kept thy word....I pray for them: I pray not for the world, but for them which thou hast given me....While I was with them in the world, I kept them in thy name; those that thou gavest me I have kept, and none of them is lost, but the son of perdition; (Judas) that the scripture might be fulfilled." "And this is the will of him that sent me, that every one that seeth the Son, and believeth on him, may have everlasting life: and I will raise him up at the last day."

The Cities of the Plain.

BY F. H. BURBANK.

Message of the angels to Lot. "We will destroy this place, because the cry of them is waxen great before the face of the Lord; and the Lord hath sent us to destroy it." Gen. xix. 13.

"Then the Lord rained upon Sodom and Gomorrah brimstone and fire from the Lord out of heaven; and he overthrew those cities, and all the plain, and all the inhabitants of the cities, and that which grew upon the ground." Gen. xix. 24, 25.

The thirteenth verse is the threatening; the others, contain the fulfilment, or execution of the penalty. The cause of this terrible judgment, was the grevious sin of all the inhabitants, there not being ten righteous persons there.

All of the foregoing teaches that all those persons are destroyed, and eternally destroyed; hence, they can never have a resurrection. Peter says, in his 2 Ep. ii. 6, "Turning the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah into ashes, condemned them with an overthrow, making them an ensample unto those that after should live ungodly." Jude says, in the seventh verse of his epistle, "Even as Sodom and Gomorrah and the cities about them....are set forth for an example, suffering the vengeance of eternal fire." Christ says, Luke xvii. 29, 30, "But the same day that Lot went out of Sodom, it rained fire and brimstone from heaven, and destroyed them all; even thus shall it be in the day when the Son of man is (shall be) revealed."

There are several self-evident truths in connection with this subject. One is: the inhabitants of those cities did not die "the Adamic death," or "the first death," as some express it, (though such phrases are not to be found in the Bible) for Adam did not die by fire and brimstone."

Another: They died for their own sins. They had long been great sinners, and Jehovah's "goodness," "longsuffering," and forbearance, alone, had suspended the execution of his fierce anger upon them.

Another: As the end of the wicked is destruction, those cities have been visited with the threatened doom. They suffered destruction by "eternal fire; hence their destruction is an eternal destruction.

Finally, having been destroyed for their own sins, there is no necessity for their being raised again from the dead. A man cannot die a "second death" twice. If they have not suffered the penalty threatened, then the "example" amounts to nothing, and we are no wiser than before we read their history.

There is a passage in Matt. x. 15 which seems to contradict such conclusions. Christ had given instructions to his twelve apostles who were going out to preach the gospel, and says in that verse concerning those who would not receive them, "It shall be more tolerable for the land of Sodom and Gomorrah in the day of judgment than for that city."

Wakefield's translation of this verse reads, "Verily I say unto you it will be more tolerable for Sodom and Gommorrah in a day of punishment, than for that city." His note on the passage I also transcribe. "EN EMERA KRISEOS, in a day of punishment, vengeance, or trial. This is undoubtedly the genuine sense of the phrase, which has not the least reference to the day of general judgment. All that our Saviour intends to say is, that, when the temporal calamaties of that place come upon it, they will be more severe than even those of Sodom and Gomorrah. See this phrase employed in precisely the same meaning by the LXX in Prov. vi. 34, where instead of KRISEOS, Aquila and Theodotion have ENDIKESEOS: Isaiah xxxiv 8, and my Commentary on this place. Our Saviour, I apprehend, had Jerusalem principally in view in this declaration."

Adam Clarke, on this passage writes as follows: "(In the day of judgment) or, punishment, —KRISEOS. Perhaps not meaning the day of general judgment, nor the day of the destruction of the Jewish state by the Romans; but a day in which God should send punishment on that particular city, or on that person, for their crimes. So the day of judgment of Sodom and Gomorrah, was the time in which the Lord destroyed them by fire and brimstone from the Lord out of heaven."

My convictions are, that Wakefield and Clarke are right, from the fact, that, (in my judgment,) there would not be much force in the Saviour's comparison, if he had not referred to the terrible visitation of God's wrath upon those who had been overthrown. He might have selected some other cities, if his purpose was other than what we have stated, but his reference to Sodom and Gomorrah, is, I believe, specially on the account of the visitation of God upon them. They are an "example." Their sins brought upon them "sudden destruction" and not one escaped.

A Stranger in a Quandary.

NEW YORK, July 17, 1865.

EDITOR OF THE HERALD OF LIFE, Sir:—Yesterday I went to hear a discussion between "Orthodox Christianity, as opposed to Spiritualism;" and to my great surprise I heard some who advocate your views opposing both Spiritualism and Orthodox Christianity. Now sir, it is evident that the Chairman does not know the laws of debate, else he would not have allowed such things. Not one of the speakers was in order. Were I a believer in Spiritualism, I should have thought the speakers were void of flesh and blood as they were of sense. It would be a most amusing thing were I to demonstrate how far away from the subject the speakers were, and how much trash was paraded as argument. Again, it would be very distressing to a godly mind to hear how the scriptures, those channels of truth, comfort and joy, were handled; but these things are not to your purpose, so I forbear. What I wish to say is, that it is unfair of your people to come to propogate their opinions at a strange meeting. If they wish a discussion on their particular opinions, let them get up one for that purpose. I confess I should much like to hear one well conducted discussion on your particular views, provided it be in the fear of God. I am a stranger here and know not where you meet, else I should long ago have gone to hear for myself, what I have heard about you in a very distant land. That you have some truth, I fully believe; but that it is drowned in a sea of untruth, I also believe until convinced to the contrary from the word of life.

I have been engaged in Religious debates with Heathen, Mohametans, Jews, Romanists, and Infidels in other parts of the world; and if what I heard yesterday is a fair specimen of a medium class of debates in America, then the standard is very low indeed.

I remain Sir, yours, PHILALETHUS.

REMARKS BY THE EDITOR.—We give place to the foregoing, because it is a respectful address by a stranger, who seems to be in a strange land. Of the "discussion" to which he refers, we know nothing beyond his statement. He complains of some advocating our views interfering in the discussion. We are sorry to hear that, and somewhat doubt if any well instructed person, holding our views had the ill manners to take part in a discussion to which he was not invited; but if so, we pray them not to intrude in such manner again. The truths we hold are too precious to be trifled with any where, and should not be thrust on parties met for discussion without invitation.

If our friend "PHILALETHUS" wishes a discussion of the question, Is there any future life, for any man, except by a union with Christ? he can probably be accommodated on due notice. We have no fears to "debate" that question with any respectable man; and he would probably soon become satisfied he was not "debating with Heathen, Mohametans, Jews, Romanists, nor Infidels," but men who would hold an opponent to the Bible testimony.

THE BENEVOLENCE OF NEANDER.—Neander's love of his fellow men, and especially of good men, was ever active and self-sacrificing. His charities were unbounded. He allowed his sister to manage his domestic affairs, according to her pleasure; but in regard to his charities he was most decided. He would suffer none to interfere here; and of the amount of his givings, he would never render an account. Vast multitudes were benefitted by him, the particulars of which will never be known. One example may be given as a specimen. During the illness of a student, which proved to be fatal, he was unable to obtain all that was necessary in this condition. A friend went to Neander and informed him of his state. As he was entering into details, Neander suddenly interrupted him, and inquired how much was needed? The friend named the sum. Neander wrung his hands in agony; he had no money at his command. He paced the room, glancing eagerly at his books. At length he stopped before a large volume, splendidly bound, one of the most valuable books in his library; and the most precious, as but few had been printed, and distributed by the author among his friends. He seized the book, put it into the hands of the student, and said, "I have no money, but take this, and try to sell it. Do it secretly, I beg; nobody must know it."—I. Indeed.

Question.

Something more than two yeas ago the following was sent to another paper, the inquirer honestly seeking for a correct understanding of the word of God. For some reason, no notice was taken of it; therefore no light was elicited. Perhaps some interested in the Herald of Life may be able to give us the desired information.

LOUISA J. BEACH.

QUES.—The Apostle Peter, 2 Pet. ii. 10, and Jude, 8, speak of a class of persons to be found in the last days, judging from the connection, who, with other characteristics, were to "despise government, or dominion, and speak evil of dignities." Has this prophecy ever been fulfilled? If so, by whom?

ANS.—We think it has, at least, had a remarkable fulfilment in this country in the last four years. "By whom" can be seen to any one with their eyes open; but we might be "personal" if more definite in our answer.

The Believer's Portion.

"The Lord is my portion, saith my soul." Then, why art thou cast down and desponding, O child of God! Though bereaved, impoverished, afflicted; though a proud, ungodly world look with scorn and contempt upon thee and thy portion; and even thine own brethren turn coldly from thee, and forsake thee in thy poverty and casting down. Still if thou canst say "The Lord is my portion," what more canst thou desire?

Compare thy portion with his who contemneth thee. Has he riches? They are "uncertain riches." They make themselves wings and fly away. Thine are "durable riches," "true riches," everlasting riches. Has he friends? How often are his friendships "but a name!" Thy friend sticketh closer than a brother; his love many waters cannot quench, no floods drown. Has he honor and power, spreading himself like a green bay-tree? How soon will it be said of him, "Yet he passed away, and lo, he was not: yea, I sought him, but he could not be found." Of earth's most prospered, most honored, most exalted ones, it is written, "Surely, thou didst set them in slippery places. How are they cast down in a moment!" But the portion of Jacob is not so. "The mercy of the Lord is from everlasting to everlasting upon them that fear him."

If earth can offer thee no portion to be compared with thine, where wilt thou go to seek a better one? Are the most highly favored of God's children on earth those who bask in the sunshine, whilst in sackcloth and ashes thou sittest in darkness? Their prosperity often eclipses their portion, whilst thou hast no such interposing obstacle. They lose far more than they gain; their affections are divided, their portion loses its value, whilst thine eye is steadily fixed, and thy portion is constantly magnifying in thine estimation. Surely, thou wouldst not exchange even thy present condition for theirs.

Go ask the angelic hosts,—those glorified and exalted beings who surround the throne of God; ask Gabriel and his companionship of archangels who stand in the presence of God, if in the countless ages of their being and the infinite extent of their researches throughout all God's dominions, one of all their innumerable host has found a portion better than thine.

Take one flight more, infinitely higher still, and, as-with profoundest awe and reverence, you bow before the dread Majesty of the universe, ask Him who is thy Portion, if in all his dominions, among all the exalted intelligences who inhabit them, or his whole universe combined, even, He has a portion superior to thine—even his own blessed self.

Child of God! has one united response come back from all thy inquiries: "No portion like God!—no portion but God!" Then cease thy sorrow, thy complaint and go on thy way rejoicing, singing aloud: "The Lord is my portion, saith my soul; therefore will I hope in him."—Selected.

The Jew and his Influence Everywhere.

The Jews are the miracle of nations. Hated, "scattered and peeled," yet power attends them, and they have always had a great influence upon the brain and exchequer of the kingdoms. In his re-written "History of the Jews," Milman, speaking of the Jewish blood, observes:

That blood was as ineffaceable both in Spain and Portugal as negro blood in the United States; the pure red of Princes, even of kings, was tainted. The shrewd Venetian ambassador, in the reign of Philip II., observing how deeply the priesthood, as well as the laity, was polluted with Jewish blood, doubted whether their Christianity was more pure than their descent. And as late as toward the close of the last century it is told of Pombal that the king of Portugal proposed to issue an edict that all who were descended from Jews should wear a yellow cap. Pombal appeared in the council with three yellow caps. The king demanded the meaning of the strange accoutrement: "One is for your Majesty, one for the Grand Inquisitor, one for myself."

It is not difficult to guess that Mr. Milman was a papist, else he would not have used the word polluted. We think, if a pollution of blood took place it was that of the Jews; for even Philip the second of Spain or the king of Portugal could not boast of such pure blood than the poorest of their Jewish subjects. For it is a fact that all these mighty kings and emperors of Europe are descendents of some daring highwaymen who gradually swung themselves up into knights, then counts or dukes and finally assumed the title of king or emperor. LEDERER.

The Infidel's Sermon to the Pirates.

A native of Sweden, who had imbibed infidel views had occasion, to go from one port to another in the Baltic Sea. When he came to the place whence he expected to sail the vessel was gone. On inquiring he found a fishing boat going the same way, in which he embarked.

After being sometime out at sea, the men observing that he had several trunks and chests on board, concluded that he must be very rich, and therefore agreed among themselves to throw him overboard. This he heard them express, which gave him great uneasiness. However, he took occasion to open one of his trunks, which contained some books. Observing this, they remarked among themselves that it was not worth while to throw him into the sea, as they didn't want any books, which they supposed was all the trunks contained. They asked him if he was a priest. Hardly knowing what reply to make them, he told them that he was; and at this they seemed much pleased, and said that they would have a sermon on the next day as it was the Sabbath.

This increased the anxiety and distress of his mind, for he knew himself to be as incapable of such an undertaking as it was possible for any one to be, as he knew very little of the Scriptures; neither did he believe in the inspiration of the Bible.

At length they came to a small rocky island, perhaps a quarter of a mile in circumference, where was a company of pirates who had chosen this little sequestered spot to deposit their treasures. He was taken to a cave and introduced to an old woman, to whom they remarked they were to have a sermon preached the next day. She said she was glad of it, for she had not heard the word of God for a great while.

His was a trying case, for preach he must; still he knew nothing about preaching. If he refused, or undertook to preach and did not please, he expected it would be his death. With these thoughts he passed a sleepless night, and in the morning his mind was not settled on anything. To call upon God, whom he believed to be inaccessible, was altogether vain. He could devise no way whereby he might be saved. He walked to and fro, still shut up in darkness, striving to collect something to say to them, but could not even think of a single sentence.

When the appointed time for the service arrived, he entered the cave, where he found the men assembled. There was a seat prepared for him, and a table and a Bible on it. They sat for the space of half an hour in profound silence, and even then the anguish of his soul was greater than human nature was capable of enduring. At length these words came to his mind:

"Verily, there is a reward for the righteous; verily there is a God that judgeth in the earth."

He arose and delivered them; then other words presented themselves, and so on, until his understanding became opened, and his heart enlarged in a manner astonishing to himself. He spoke on subjects suited to their condition; the rewards of the righteous the judgments of the wicked, the necessity of repentance, and the importance of change of life. The matchless love of God to the children of men had such a wonderful effect on the minds of these wretched beings that they were melted into tears.

Nor was he less astonished at the unbounded goodness of Almighty God in thus interposing to save his spiritual as well as his natural life; and well might he exclaim, "This is the Lord's doing, and marvelous in our eyes."

Under a deep sense of God's goodness, his heart became filled with thankfulness, which it was out of his power to express. What a marvelous change was thus suddenly bro't about by divine interposition! He who a little while before disbelieved in communion with God, became as humble as a little child; and they who were so lately meditating on his death, now were filled with love and good will towards each other, particularly towards him manifesting kindness, and willing to render him all the assistance in their power.

The next morning they fitted out one of their vessels and conveyed him whither he desired. From that time he became a changed man; from being a slave to the influence of infidelity, he was brought to be a sincere believer in the power and efficacy of the truth as it is in Jesus.

A LINE OUT OF PLACE.—In our last week's issue one line got by some mishap out of place and makes strange reading. It is in the first column, on the first page. The fourth line from the bottom should be placed above the two next over it. It will then read "If there be any such fire, it may be prepared for the general conflagration; but after the general conflagration we are assured, there will be a 'new heavens and a new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness,' and consequently there can be no such place as hell."

We seldom make these corrections, if errors occur, as our readers, for the most part, readily discover such mistakes and rectify them themselves.

Salt as an Article of Food.

BY MRS. B. PARKS.

I noticed in your last issue an article entitled, "Salt is Good," containing some of Prof. Johnson's reasons for holding salt to be necessary for the human system, also, some ideas from J. S. White, the writer, and a concluding remark by the Editor.

We will not object to the argument of Prof. Johnson in regard to the necessity of salt in the human organization, perhaps man cannot exist without it; but we cannot agree with him in the use of it in its mineral form. We are not prepared to accept his statement, that feeding culprits on saltless food has been the cause of horrible deaths. We call for his evidence; "it is said," will not satisfy an inquiring mind. We have heard these things from time to time but are still skeptical for the reason that sufficient evidence has not been given. We have seen statements to the contrary that it was not for the lack of salt but on account of their being fed with mouldy wormy bread.

The Prof. says: "Fifty seven per cent of the saline matter of the blood consists of common salt." Does he mean that this proportion is found in the blood, or that this is the necessary amount that the blood should contain? The fact that salt is discharged every day through the skin and kidneys, proves nothing, as these are the avenues through which nature always rids herself of foreign or waste matter.

J. S. White says: "If salt is in its nature injurious, God never would have required holy men to salt meat and then eat it." Did God ever require holy men to salt meat and then eat it? If he did please give the facts. Mr. White says: "He has never been acquainted with the diet of any person in common health who did not eat more or less salt." He also suggests the idea of "some one trying the experiment for twelve months." I hope he may be induced to try the experiment himself.

Now, I believe if there is salt enough in the soil, there will be a sufficient quantity contained in vegetation, and we shall have no occasion for supplying it in a mineral form, any more than lime which is found in a greater proportion in the human organization than salt; composing nearly all of the bony structure. Why not eat lime in its mineral form with our food? also, iron? I believe all accounts from Japan on this subject to be, that its millions of inhabitants have never known the use of salt with food.

I will say for the benefit of those who are desirous of having the experiment tried, that it has been tried; not for twelve months only; but for thirty months. My husband and myself, two and a half years ago, abandoned the use of salt; also spices, animal food, and stimulants of all kinds, and have not used them since. I do my own cooking, and know there has not been a grain of salt used in preparing our food during that time. We do not use corned beef, mince pie, or any pie having the crust shortened with the fat of swine; should no more think of using such pies as food, than of entering a house where all its inmates were sick with small-pox in order to breathe pure air.

When we left off using the articles named my husband had very poor health, felt that his life was in danger and that something must be done. This is all we did. His health has very much improved; instead of a pale, sickly countenance, which he had always before had, he has rosy cheeks and every appearance of health; weighing from ten to fifteen pounds more than formerly. My health is perfectly good.

These are facts. I pen them for your consideration. We do not attribute all this change to the abandonment of salt alone; but, to all things combined, as we use graham bread and other articles in their more simple form! We can say from our own experience, that man can live and enjoy perfect health, without the use of salt in a mineral form.

We are not the only ones who have tried it; others can witness to the same; but we will only speak for ourself, and let others do the same. If any one after reading this should desire more extensive information than can be obtained by writing, if you will call at No. 11 Fay St., Utica, N. Y., we will be pleased to favor you with such information, also a dinner prepared without salt, if you should prefer it.

Utica, N. Y., July 10, 1865.

REMARKS BY THE EDITOR.—We have now given two articles on the use of salt in food; about as much probably as is profitable; yet we think we will give one more next week from an English Medical Work; and then we hope the matter will not be further pressed on the attention of our readers. We regard the subject as one to be settled by each individual for himself; and we leave it to their own taste or judgment. To some it may be an injury to use it; to others a great benefit. We leave the matter where Paul left similar ones, Rom. xii. "For one believeth that he may eat all things: another, who is weak, eateth herbs. Let not him that eateth, despise him that eateth not; and let not him which eateth not, judge him that eateth; for God hath received him." When a certain paper had opened its columns to urge the injurious effects of salt-eating, if not the wickedness of it; and a brother responded, but was refused a full hearing, we gave him place for a rejected article, with no intention however of opening the door to a protracted discussion, as the subject is aside from our main object. Let each one be fully persuaded in his own mind "to eat or not to eat;" but let no one make his conclusion or practice a law for another, on this question.

The reference of Br. White to "God's command" about salting meat and then eating it, is, doubtless, to the use of salt in all the sacrifices made by ancient Israel. God commanded, "With all thine offerings thou shalt offer salt." Lev. ii. 13. Also, that a portion of those offerings, were for the Priests; that is, they were eaten by them. Salt was certainly an article much used by Israel. When the Jews returned from the captivity in Babylon, Artaxerxes, the king of Persia, made a "decree to all the treasurers, which are beyond the river, that whatsoever Ezra the priest, the scribe of the law of the God of heaven, shall require of you, it be done speedily, unto a hundred talents of silver, and a hundred measures of wheat....and salt without prescribing how much." Ezra vii. 21, 22.

Obituary.

FELL asleep in Jesus, July 3, 1865, in Corinna, Me., ABBY A. DAVIS, only daughter of Eld. B. K. and Susannah Davis—Aged thirteen years and seven months. The subject of this notice had been a great sufferer from Scrofula for a long time; but previous to her death the Whooping Cough set in, which greatly increased the pains and miseries of the little sufferer, and probably was the means of hastening her to the grave, from whence we trust she will soon be raised to life through the Great LIFE-GIVER, to die no more.

Words of comfort were administered to the mourning circle by Eld. John Billings, on July 4th. GEO. H. FISHER.

Responsibilities.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. He often differs from them; but believes in a free exchange of thoughts. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not: he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

OUR ISRAELITISH ORIGIN.—A work on Prophecy. It was written by Prof. WILSON, England, some years since. We republished it, believing it could not fail to interest all thinking men, whatever might be thought of the accuracy of its positions. For ourself, we indorse the general theory that the Anglo-Saxons are the literal descendants of Israel, in the line of Joseph and Ephraim. Price, 50 cents, in paper covers only. Postage 6 cents.

Books.

Notwithstanding the greatly increased price of printing materials, the only change we make in our Catalogue of prices, is, to advance BIBLE VS. TRADITION, bound, to $1: in paper cover, to 70 cents: and the amount to be pre-paid for postage, for the present, must be added on any work called for in our list of books and pamphlets. The Purchaser of books and pamphlets will understand that our Catalogue, as now revised in the HERALD OF LIFE, will be our guide in all cases of sale, and that all previous ones, whether in this paper or in any works of ours containing Catalogues, are hereby revoked.

The Life & Advent Union.

II. Any person believing in Life through Christ alone, (thereby denying any future life to unbelievers,) and sustaining a Christian character, may become a member of this Union by subscribing to the Constitution.

III. The officers of this Union shall be a President, Vice President, Secretary, Treasurer, and seventeen Directors, who together shall constitute the Managing Board, and who are to be elected annually.

IV. The Managers shall be authorized to collect funds for the Union, which funds shall be transmitted to the Business Agent, who shall keep account of the same and transfer them to the Treasurer.

V. The Members of the Board of Directors shall constitute a Committee in their several districts to transact all business pertaining to the Union in their several localities.

VI. The Annual meeting and such other meetings as may be deemed necessary by the Board of Managers, shall be called by giving three weeks' notice.

VII. The Secretary shall keep a record of the names and post-office addresses of the members.

VIII. This Constitution may be amended by a two-thirds vote at any Annual meeting.

NOTE.—This organization is in no sense a Church. It is simply a Union for the specific purpose of issuing, through the use of the press, such periodicals and other works as shall spread what we regard the truth of God. All persons are welcome to work with us, even though they differ from us in their views on some points: but the Union, by the 2nd Article, intended to guard against being thwarted in their design by votes of persons adverse to its object.—ED. On all books and pamphlets sent by mail the postage has to be pre-paid.

SIX SERMONS on the inquiry, Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the Life-giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by GEO. STORRS; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This word contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in plain binding, 50 cents; in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near ten years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, it he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER: OR, MAN IN DEATH; AND THE HOPE FOR A FUTURE LIFE.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead, can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none there fore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD; OR, THE RIGHTEOUS ONLY WILL LIVE AGAIN. By GEO. STORRS. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the EDITOR of the HERALD OF LIFE. Price, $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.—IMMORTALITY: The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev, T. M. POST, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by GEO. STORRS. Price in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. POST, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a Prize Essay on IMMORTALITY, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men, without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. POST took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The REVIEWER followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The Author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

BIBLE VS. TRADITION: in which the True Teaching of the Bible is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity Life, Death, &c. Price, bound, $1. Postage 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. It is a work of much labor and research. The title indicates its object, and the performance shows the object was kept in view throughout. The language is sometimes severe on what is called "orthodoxy"—more so than is desirable—but the value of the work, in general, cannot be over-estimated. Thousands of it have been sent abroad, and thousand more ought to be scattered. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subjects; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

Poetry.

A PSALM OF LIFE.

God is our refuge in distress—
Our safeguard in the wilderness—
Our shelter from the storm;
Though winds and waves a conflict make,
Though earth's foundations reel and shake,
We need not feel alarm.

A peaceful river softly flows
In tranquil streams to gladden those
Who put their trust in God;
Within his holy place they feel
The comfort of his presence still,
While oceans roll abroad.

What though the heathen madly rage,
And kingdoms in fierce war engage?
When God sends forth his voice,
He makes the glittering spear to bend,
Sends peace to earth's remotest end,
And bids the world rejoice.

Be still, and know that he is good,
He rules the earth with iron rod,
And sits enthroned above;
He dwells with those who own his name,
The God of Jacob still the same—
The God of peace and love.

GENERAL SHERIDAN.

There is less known about the early life of this general than any other. His birth-place has been, for some time, a matter of dispute; but it seems now to be decided that he is a native of the same region which produced Grant and Sherman—Southern Ohio. Sheridan is, by nearly ten years, the youngest of our great captains—having been born in the year 1831:

"An incident of his early childhood is told, which indicates his fondness for horsemanship, even then, and renders his subsequent success, as a cavalry officer, less surprising. He was but five years of age, when some older boys, in a spirit of mischief, placed him on the back of a spirited horse, grazing in a field near his father's house, and started the horse off at a run; but to their terror, the horse, becoming frightened, leaped the fences, and proceeded at a break-neck pace along the highway—the little urchin clinging fast to his back. The boys supposed that the child would inevitably be killed; but after a run of many miles, the horse, completely exhansted and covered with foam, stopped at the stable of a hotel where its owner was accustomed to put up, the child still on its back. The horse was recognized, and though the child's statement that be had come so many miles on its back, without saddle or bridle, was at the first doubted, it was soon confirmed, and the villagers began to question him. 'Who learned you to ride?' asked one. 'Nobody,' said the boy. 'Did no one teach you to sit on a horse?' inquired another. 'Oh yes! Bill Seymour told me to hold on with my knees, and I did.' 'Weren't you scared?' asked the villager. 'Nary a bit,' said the boy. 'I wanted to go on further, but the horse wouldn't go.' 'Aren't you sore?' continued his questioner. 'Kinder,' said little Phil; 'but I'll feel better to-morrow, and then I'll ride back home.' 'That boy,' said the villager to his companion, 'has got pluck enough to be an Indian hunter.' The next day the little fellow was sick and sore, but wanted to go home; but the kind-hearted farmers would not let him go till he was well. Meantime the owner came, and expressed his surprise at the boy's having been able to keep his seat, as the horse was vicious, and had thrown some superior horsemen."

THE LOST CHILD.

The sharp, quick sound of a crier's bell was heard above the rattle of carriages and the hum of multitudes hastening home as night came on, and the words "Child lost! child lost!" fell upon the ears, and sent a thrill of pain to the hearts of fathers and mothers, as the crier passed up the street to the next corner, where he stopped to give a description of the wanderer.

How many held their breath and listened. "Child lost! child lost! A little girl—not quite three years of age—her hair light and curly—eyes blue; when she left home she was dressed in a scarlet frock and white apron; has been missing four hours!" And again the bell was heard as the crier went on, proclaiming as he went the same mournful story.

And where, all this time, was little Lily Ashton? Soon after she left her father's door she made the acquaintance of other children on the street, with whom she played awhile, and then many things amused her as she ran along on the crowded sidewalk, unnoticed by the busy throng; but at length she discovered that her home was no longer in sight, and that no dear papa or mamma answered her call; and the poor little lost one sat down on a door-step and wept bitterly. A kind-hearted gentleman came that way—one who loved children, and who was never happier than when they smiled on him from their bright faces, which they could hardly help doing when he smiled so pleasantly on them, and who was always ready to speak comforting words when they were in trouble.

"What's the matter, little Blossom?" he asked.

His voice was so full of love that Lily stopped crying, and brushing back her curls, looked up to see who it was that spoke to her. The light from a street lamp above her shone full upon his benevolent face. "I isn't 'little Blossom;' I is Lily, and I want mamma," she said, and the tears began to flow again.

"But Lily won't cry any more, because we will go and find mamma. Will Lily go with me?"

Her tears ceased flowing, and she looked up into the kind face once more. "Has you got a little girl, and is she 'little Blossom?'"

"No, my dear; I have no Lily nor Blossom, only when I find one such as you; but I love little girls and boys, and I don't like to see you cry. Will you go with me to find your mamma?"

Lily stood up and put her hand in his, for her heart was won.

The kind gentleman lifted the tired little girl in his arms, and carried her to the nearest police station, where he knew he would learn what she could not tell him about her home. And in a short time he placed the lost darling in the arms of her mother, whose anguish was thus turned into joy. He found other children—brothers and sisters—in that home; and the parents and children gathered around Lily, lost hours before, but now found; and as they laughed and wept by turns, he felt that he was receiving a richer reward in seeing their happiness—their joy over one dear child—than thanks, however earnest, could be.

I know you do not wonder that this family were so glad to see Lily again. But their gladness reminds me—perhaps it has reminded you also—of some of the words of Jesus: "Joy shall be in heaven over one sinner that repenteth." Can you tell me why the family in heaven are joyful when a sinner repents? A sinner, you know, is one who is disobeying God; who does not love or trust in Christ; who is lost in the world, and who will never find the way to the kingdom of God, unless he repents. Do you not think that if you were in heaven, and could hear that some one on earth, who had been wicked, had repented and begun to love Jesus, and was to be happy and holy forever—you would be glad?

Come with the children of God; and there will be joy in heaven over you far beyond that which was felt in Lily's family when she was found. One is there who loves you far more than any friend on earth can love, and he will receive you gladly.—Selected.

HONORING THE HOARY HEAD.

There was was to be a lecture in the town hall in the village of G——. The lecturer was a man of reputation, and a crowd was expected. John Gordon was determined he would have a seat. "Boys," said he to some of his young companions, "I am going to have a seat at the lecture to-night."

"You may get one, but you will be turned out of it before the lecture begins. More than likely there will be women enough to fill all the seats," said one.

"Say ladies, not women," said another.

"I said women instead of ladies, because all the women that come are not ladies. At the last lecture there was an old man sitting in one of the chairs and a woman came along and said to him: "Will you give a lady a seat?" The old man got up and gave her his seat, but I don't think he gave it to a lady."

"I saw a young lady offer the old man her seat."

"That is very likely."

In the afternoon, John employed himself in making a camp-stool that could be folded up in a very small compass. He had seen one in possession of a travelling artist, and as he possessed considerable mechanical ingenuity, he succeeded in producing a very tolerable imitation of said stool.

As the time drew near he put it under his arm and went to the hall. No one could tell from its appearance what kind of a bundle he had under his arm. His plan was to remain standing till all the ladies had arrived and were seated, and the lecture began. Then he intended to unfold his stool and have a comfortable seat.

The seats were at length filled. Here and there a gentleman had a seat, being surrounded and defended in the possession of it by female friends. John took his seat in the little space before the desk, creating a smile by the gravity with which he converted a bundle into what was a good substitute for a chair.

He had comfortably settled himself, when he saw an aged man with white locks standing in the aisle, leaning on his cane. It was an old man who seldom came out at night, but the fame of the Lecturer had brought him out.

John remembered the command to honor the hoary head. His inclinations and his duty coincided. He arose and went to the old man, led him forward, and gave him his seat. The act was greeted by a warm round of applause by the audience. John did not have a seat during the lecture, but he felt better than if he had.—Selected.

MISSIONARY NOTES.

BY T. W. SMITH.

June 22d, left home for Tama Co. Reached Br. Clover's, 30 miles from here, near sunset. Found them well, and had some interesting conversation on the life theme. Expected to have preached that evening, but no appointment had been given. Br. Clover thought of "splicing teams" with Br. Harlan and both families go, but Br. H. failed to perform his part of the arrangement; so in order that Br. C, and wife could go, I left my buggy at his place and put my horse with his and we went the rest of the journey in a large wagon. Reached Br. A. Carter's in time for supper. Meeting held that evening at Br. R. Stephen's, who formerly lived here, and who with his family of six souls are believers in no life out of Christ—or no revival of wicked dead men. Arranged for preaching at the same place on the morrow. 11 A. M., Saturday, Br. Clover spoke on "Christ the true vine," showing that it is necessary to be united to Christ and abide in that relation to have life, and that a branch cut off, and withered, never can live again. I spoke at night from Acts iii. 19. Met at that same place at 11 A. M., Sunday. Same subject—the restitution. Br. C. spoke at 3 P. M., on the "One hope, and one body." I addressed the people at night on the "Thief on the cross." Many were at the meetings who had never heard the truth, and most were convinced of the truthfulness of our position: goodly number of tracts taken, and a number of invitations to visit new fields and preach the word of life. We talked with individuals during the intervals on the duty of believing and obeying God; and with some of the Brn. on the non-resurrection of the ungodly. Convinced several of the truth; others acknowledge their position shaken. We asked one good old Br. if he would answer several questions that we would like to ask? He said he would. So we inquired if 1 Cor. xv. 17, 18 did not teach that the resurrection of God's children depends upon the resurrection of Christ? He acknowledged that it did.

We asked then, 1. If christians are now only asleep in Christ; 2. That if Christ is not raised they are placed in a different relation, i. e, they are perished? 3. That they perish because not raised? 4. If christians would perish if not raised, would not sinners? 5. Is not "to perish" the doom of the ungodly? 6. Do they not pay the penalty of sin when they perish? 7. If they perish by not being raised, and to perish is the penalty, do they not receive the reward of ill doing by remaining eternally dead, and is not the law satisfied? 8. Would not a revival from the dead to perish the 2nd time be a double punishment for sin, or an infliction of punishment twice?

To these queries, he answered in the affirmative; and after some discussion on other points finally came to the conclusion that his former views were the dregs of immortalsoulism, and part of the torment theory.

We left for home Monday morning, reached Br. Clover's in the evening, and arrived at home the following day. For this trip we received about a bushel and a half of corn. We spent six days in the trip. But we are not complaining—far from it; we are paid abundantly. We have forsaken much for Christ: we receive much more from him in return.

July 1. Left home for Br. Cady's neighborhood, about 16 miles from here. Reached there toward night. Spoke in the schoolhouse at night on "Loving Christ." Visited and talked on various Bible themes. Preached at same place at 11 A. M., and 2 P. M., then left for a former place of preaching, 6 miles from there, and spoke at 5 P. M., on "that which is born of flesh is flesh, and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit"—and not flesh. Went home with Br. Peck—and discussed the non-resurrection question—until he relinquished his notions. There is no better way to settle this matter than to converse individually about it. The truth progresses. Invariably others introduce the subject; they want light, and light they will and shall have.

We expect to visit Br. Martin's neighborhood to-morrow, and spend several days. I have but little time to spend at home; seldom there more than two days in a week, as I sometimes have to spend two days in going, and two in returning from appointments. Pray for us.

"THE SANDS OF TIME." NO. 3.

We have discussed two fictitious periods, and a third remains—the 2500 years. This period is partly founded on a passage in Lev. xxv. "And thou shalt number seven sabbaths of years unto thee, seven times seven years; and the space of the seven sabbaths of years shall be unto thee forty and nine years. Then shalt thou cause the trumpet of the jubilee to sound on the tenth day of the seventh month; in the day of atonement shall ye make the trumpet sound throughout all your land. And shall hallow the fiftieth year, and proclaim liberty throughout the land unto all the inhabitants thereof: it shall be a jubilee unto you; and ye shall return every man unto his possession, and ye shall return every man unto his family. A jubilee shall that fiftieth year be unto you."

Taking this jubilee or period of fifty years for a partial basis, it is assumed that a jubilee of jubilees, or 2500 years, must be the year of Christ's coming, beginning the period in the eighteenth year of King Josiah's reign, which is assumed to be the date of the last jubilee kept by Israel. (Some begin at other times, but the argument is the same). Our answer to this is direct." 1. The Bible says not a word of any such period as a jubilee of jubilees. It is an assumption, pure and simple.

2. Admiting the period, it is still a pure assumption to begin it at the eighteenth year of Josiah. There is not the least evidence that that year was a jubilee year.

3. But admiting that it was a jubilee year, it would not be the suitable time to begin the 2500 years. They would properly commence at the first year of the first jubilee period, which began when the children of Israel entered the land of Canan. Lev. xxv. 2.

To reverse the argument: 1. If there were such a period as a jubilee of jubilees, it is evident that the great period commenced when the small one did. The first year of the first jubilee was the first year of the jubilee of jubilees. But this arrangement would make the 2500 years end far in the past, and time agitators could not exist on such a theory. Hence the beginning of the period is pushed down to a year that makes the end a trifle in the future, just far enough to keep time stock at or above par. The speculators of Wall st. never engaged in a more illegitimate business than this.

2. To say that the eighteenth year of Josiah or any other year was the last jubilee year kept by Israel is to say what cannot be probed. We defy any one to give us the date of a single jubilee year. The perfect silence of the sacred records on this point has been made use of as an argument against any actual observance of the jubilee at any time in the past. Says Henry Hart Milman, in his Revised History of the Jews: "Was this constitution ever carried out to its perfect development? Did the Jewish people ever fulfil the noble scheme of the Jewish legislator? Was it not, in fact, an ideal religious republic, an Utopia, existing in the mind of the wise lawgiver....but never realized upon earth? Of the observance of the Sabbatic year, still less of the great Agrarian law of the jubilee, we have no record, not even an allusion, in the Jewish annals or in the sacred books. If it was a periodical or even an occasional usage, whence this silence? or is it not another illustration of the perverseness and unfitness of the Israelites for their wonderful destination?" If Mr. Milman is correct in his argument, it is extremely probable that the sabbatic years and jubilees will be observed in the coming age, and the noble scheme of Moses will then be wrought out to perfection.

3. The jubilee of jubilees is a pure fiction. What we have said will apply still more emphatically to the 49 years theory of J. V. Himes, Miles Grant, and Co. Of all speculators in assumption, they take the lead. Let them have rope enough and the result is evident. But we pity the victims of their schemes.

THE GOSPEL AMONG THE JEWS.

BY G. R. LEDERER, EDITOR OF ISRAELITE INDEED.

Still, like deep water that constantly widens its channel without noise, and almost imperceptible, is the work of the Gospel among the children of Jacob. This is more the case in this country than in Europe, as the converts here are by far more liable to persecution, though the Jews claim the fullest liberty of conscience for themselves—and well they may—but are by no means willing to cede the same privilege to those of their brethren and sisters, whose consciences have been convinced of that great and divine truth, that Jesus of Nazareth was indeed the Messiah of Israel.

While the christian religious press seem to take not the least notice of conversions of Gentiles to Judaism, mostly women who either already are or are intending to be married to Jewish husbands, and which is pompously published in Jewish papers, the latter cannot forbear to make remarks of the bitterest kind, when the conversion of a Jew to Christianity is announced. Anything but a pure motive is ascribed to the convert; he must be a scoundrel, a hypocrite who sold his religion as Judas Iscariot did his master, for thirty pieces of silvér, or for some crumbs from the rich table of the Gentiles, or, at least, if all these accusations can be demonstratively refuted, he is pronounced to be out of his mind. No wonder, then, that though scarcely one month passes in which one or more of the children of Jacob make the profession of their faith in Jesus of Nazareth as their Messiah and Saviour, and join different bodies of christians, very little is known outside of the church of which they became members, and even the missionary who first presented to them the bread of life, is not often permiitted to rejoice at the happy success of his labors, till he finds the parties as by chance. But even of those whose final conversion the missionary is timely informed, he finds it necessary, for the sake of the convert, not to give any public notice.

When we look back upon our work during the last year, we find no words to express our painful feeling for our manifold shortcomings, whilst we desire to lift our voice in gratitude to Almighty God for the many blessings he has been pleased to bestow upon our feeble efforts to promote the Gospel of the Kingdom of his well beloved Son, amongst his ancient people of the house of Israel. Though there was no want of many disappointments; yet, as long as Jews come, in private and public, to listen to the proclamation of Messiah's ambassadors it would be sinful to "despise the day of small things." (Zech. iv. 10). But why do we say small things? We should rather say the day of great things.

It is a great thing that scores of Jews, some with their wives and children, can be found, with Bible in hand, on every Lord's Day, in Christian places of worship, attentively listening to the preacning, and not seldom criticising what they think not to be in harmony with the teachiug of the Old Testament Scriptures.

It is a great thing that so many Jews return to a diligent study of Moses and the Prophets, and that they study them from our German or English Bibles, in which the New Testament is annexed to the Old, so that they have an opportunity to compare scripture with scripture, and to find at last, that the utmost harmony prevails between both.

It is not a small thing that the Jews have introduced the same Bible—the Old and New Testaments—into their Sunday schools, and into most of their private institutions. It is true, they may, and we suppose they really do, forbid their children the reading of the of the second part of the sacred volume, or may otherwise try to prevent them from doing so. But who knows not that the forbidden fruit is the most alluring, and that "stolen waters taste sweetly?" And as once the forbidden fruit proved fatal to the whole human race, why should not the inspired Word prove beneficial to many who may read it, though they must do it secretly?

The fruit of a public discussion with the Jews. In 1857, we held public discussions with the Jews in this city. Some of our New York friends who frequently attended those interesting meetings, will recollect a young man who took an active part in the discussions, stoutly defending his unbelief in Jesus being the Messiah. After these meetings were suspended, that young man often called on us privately, and we discussed the all-important question pending between Jews and Gentiles, more leisurely than could be done in public. His last call was for a Hebrew Bible, which we cheerfully gave him, after which we saw him no more, neither could we learn any thing of him.

Six years afterwards, some of my friends in ——, subscribers to "The Israelite Indeed," invited me to deliver them a lecture or two on unfulfilled prophecies. We accepted the invitation, and spoke to a considerable audience from the different denominations in the place. After the meeting, a young man came forward, and addressed us with the question: "Mr. L., do you know me?" We could not recollect ever having seen him before, and answered therefore in the negative. But, when he made mention of the public discussion in New York, we recognized him at once, as that young Israelite who so long and so stoutly resisted the Spirit of Truth. "I have been a christian, sir, for nearly four years," said he, "and my story is soon told. When I left you I went to B——, and learned the trade of a blacksmith. The question whether Jesus of Nazareth was the Messiah or not, troubled me constantly; I wished that he was not, but feared that he was, and this struggle went on within me until my anticipated fear became realized; I became convinced that Jesus was, indeed, our blessed, long hoped and long prayed-for Messiah. But, then, I sought not the counsel of flesh and blood; I humbled myself in prayer before the throne of God; I prayed in the Name of the long despised Nazarene, and lo, my prayer was heard and accepted. I rose from my knees comforted and forthwith I repaired to D——, told him my case, and requested farther instruction. After a couple of weeks I felt that my faith was built upon the Rock of Ages, and I was baptised in the Name of Him whom I had so long and so wickedly resisted. I felt happy; I have a trade by which I can make an honest living wherever I may settle down, and a faith that gives me the assurance of everlasting life in the kingdom of God.

"I should have written to you long since, had I not been prevented by a false sense of shame. You remember that I often asserted in your hearing that no man could convince me of the truth of Christianity, and that for no price I would become a Christian." "Well, my brother," we replied, "you have faithfully kept your word. No man convinced you of the truth which we proclaimed to you, but the Spirit of God did it; and no worldly price was given or ever offered to you to become a Christian. You received the water of life without money and without price, and you were not paid for receiving it."

We spent a happy evening together, and we rejoiced in having experienced another evidence that the good seed is never lost.

POWER OF HABIT.

Men have an idea that it is in the power of man, by his will, to change his life instantly. They think that, if a man is going wrong, he has the power to instantly go right. Do you believe that? A great many do. It would be very comforting to believe that, if I should go on sinning forty or fifty years, I could, notwithstanding the terrific law of habit, and without regard to the momentums of moral tendency, by the simple power of volition, turn around, in a second, and be as good as I would have been if I had taken the opposite course. What a labor-saving machine volition is, if it has such a power! But can a man do botch-work as a cabinet maker for years and years, never making a close joint, and never training his eye or his hand to closeness, and then, at the age of forty or fifty, instantly change all his habits and become a good workman? Can a man that has been a tricky politician for forty years, in a moment become a high-minded, magnanimous, Washington man? I do not mean the city of Washington, but George Washington! Everybody knows that such things are impossible. What says the Scripture on that point?

"Can the Ethiopian change his skin, or the leopard his spots? then may ye also do good, that are accustomed to do evil."

Learn to do well. It is to the last degree important that we should teach the young that bad courses of conduct lay foundations that cannot be taken up in a hurry. And though a man may, in the twinkling of an eye, in a moment, by volition, turn around, and begin to try to undo the wrong in his life, and rebuild that life on better habits, that undoing and rebuilding is a life-long process. A man that has been wicked, cannot turn instantly from his wickedness, and rub out the effects of his past life.

A man sees a hole in the ground, and, moved by curiosity to know what is in it, takes a torch, and begins to descend, saying: "I am going down to explore this opening, and when I am tired I will wheel about and come out." He goes down, and down; and as he goes down the dirt falls in behind him, and is choking up the passage. He, all unconscious of danger, creeps along, and creeps along, until his torch is almost consumed, and he says, "I must go back, or I shall be without a light, and it will be difficult for me to find my way in the darkness." And when he turns around, there is this rock that is heavier than he can move, and the passage is clogged, and his light goes out, and he is enveloped in darkness, and he dies in his own trap!

And it is just so with young men who think that the power of the will is sufficient to enable them to change their life in an instant. The will has power simply to enable you to start in the right course, if you have been going in the wrong one—nothing more; and every step of the way out of sin will be a step in which you will have to give an equivalent for everything you gain. Every bad habit that you form must be overcome by earnest endeavor; every knot that is tied in wrong must be untied by teeth and fingers; and this doctrine that you can correct evil conduct at once by volition is false—false to God, false to Nature, and false to experience. And there is every reason in the world, of honor, why a young man should never take a step in any other direction than that of truth, and purity, and right, and manliness. There is every reason of interest why he should not. There is every reason of fear why he should not. For every step that you take in the wrong direction, you must take two steps in getting back.

It is but an inflection of this that we find among Christians who are but partially enlightened, and who think that they may have Christian experiences and Christian graces for the asking.—H. W. Beecher.

REMARK BY THE EDITOR.—The foregoing is good as far as it goes; but it leaves out of sight the real and only hope of victory over bad habits and sin. Help must come from God; and you can no more overcome sinful habits without such help than Mr. Beecher's man in the "hole in the ground" could get out alone, with his light gone and the rocks and sand in his passage. He must have help outside of himself, or he is lost. Let all remember to overcome, they must look to God, in Christ the POWER-GIVER, who alone can deliver them from their worse than Egyptian task-masters, the evil habits of sin.

THE WESTERN MISSION.—NO. 7.

FROM W. S. CAMPBELL.

In a previous communication, I left off with an allusion to the last meeting at Summum. We had a better and more intelligent class to listen: a class who could appreciate the arguments by which we proved in the first place the falsity of the doctrine of eternal torment; and secondly, the truth from scripture that only the rightous will be raised to life from the dead.

Since our previous meeting there, we found the Campbellite Brethren had held a protracted effort; and, as might have been expected, some severe flings were made at us. Such passages as this verse paraded—"What shall it profit a man if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul?" Again, "There shall be a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and the unjust;" the people supposing the quotation made a positive and complete text. When, without information, I took these texts, one in the forenoon the other in the evening, there was a great interest to find what the Yankee minister would do with them; and they found, in due time, that not one particle of evidence remained for the foundation on which their minister would try to place them.

But it is easy here, as elsewhere, for the confiding, especially, to entertain the convictions of the past; for this requires no investigation. And the most of people are too indolent to inquire for the truth; none indeed will pursue an earnest and constant study to obtain it, who do not receive a love of it. Another difficulty before the mind is the cross the truth involves. Few are willing to become its uncompromising advocates. With all new and great developments of truth, there is a call, upon those who are so blessed as to be made the partakers of the benefits, to proclaim to the world the light which has dawned upon their own understanding.

But if men are taught that they have nothing to learn, no light to seek for, no faith to exercise, no doctrine to build upon, except it may be the doctrine of water baptism, they may consent to stop the usual course of thinking and acting, (being all, entirely worldly in the whole mind and life, and particularly ignorant of the divine testimony) long enough to attend to an outward ordinance, then move on as they were before. The religious teaches make them believe they "have investigated all these subjects, and there is no benefit in people studying into the mysteries of the Bible."

How different this from the language of Christ in respect to truth, and the inculcation of the Apostles, with their own example. Paul, the great preacher of faith to the Gentiles, could thank God that he had baptized only a very few....for he was sent not to baptize but to preach the faith delivered; and for which they were to contend. The example of the early Christians and martyrs, who suffered the loss of all things, and scaled their testimony with their blood, instruct us on this point. The example of the reformers, and living Christians in every age, (and "the just shall live by his faith") is in point. In Luther's time the peasants and women were so well instructed that in scripture argument they could confute all the positions of Romish priests.

Look at the example of the Christian Churches, in early days in this country. Here is a specimen of the effect of preaching, worthy of note. 'Tis true the time had not come for the cloud to break and give room for the true light of Immortality; but we see the moral power which the gospel possessed, especially among that so often abused class, the Puritans. Now, thank God, there are those upon whose minds the joyous sunlight of another age has burst, and who will not hold their peace, till in brightness the salvation of Zion goes forth. Before the anxious seat, was substituted for the mercy seat, and some outward act for faith; and the speculations of so called preachers and doctors were adopted instead of the word, before coming to the altar took the place of coming to Christ, men were expected to have an acquaintance with the divine word that they might become Christians.

Now, some are convinced and ready to abandon the foolish errors of the sects and stand on the rock of divine Revelation. May God enable them to come out and bear the christian cross.

The absence of the element of truth in the great body of the church, upon this mighty question of life in Christ, is the cause of the moving flood of error, which is carrying the great proportion of professors back to Romanism or heathenism. God may overrule the heathen element (Spiritualism); for in it the freedom is found to thwart the progress and prevent the ascending of papacy in this country. Protestantism is powerless to-day to do it!

There is no hope from Protestantism for the salvation of pilgrim liberty in this land. And why should Protestants fight against Rome as a whole? The most palpable errors, in the church, are common to each.

UTTER DESTRUCTION.

BY ELD. F. H. BURBANK.

"I will send my fear before thee, and will destroy all the people to whom thou shalt come." Exodus xxiii. 27. This promise was made to Israel at mount Sinai. It was a promise of deliverance from their enemies, who were idolaters, and exceedingly wicked. Destruction is their doom. "The waters of a full cup are wrung out to them."

FULFILMENT.

Num xxi. 3. "And the Lord hearkened to the voice of Israel, and delivered up the Cananites; and they utterly destroyed THEM and their cities; and he called the name of the place Hormah (utter destruction.)

Deut. ii. 34. "And we took all his (Sihon's,) cities at that time, and utterly destroyed the men, and the women, and the little ones of every city: we left none to remain.

Deut. iii. 6. (The kingdom of Og in Bashan. Sixty cities.) "We utterly destroyed them, as we did unto Sihon king of Heshbon, utterly destroying the men, women, and children of every city."

Josh. vi. 21 (Jericho.) "And they utterly destroyed all that was in the city, both men and women, young and old, and ox, and sheep, and ass, with the edge of the sword."

Josh. viii. 26. "For Joshua drew not his hand back, wherewith he stretched out the spear, until he had utterly destroyed all the inhabitants of Ai."

Josh. x. 28. "And that day Joshua took Makkedah, and smote it with the edge of the sword, and the king thereof: he utterly destroyed them, and all the souls that were therein." Josh. x. 30. "And the Lord delivered it (Libnah) also, and the king thereof into the hand of Israel; and he smote it with the edge of the sword, and all the souls that were therein." Josh. x. 10. (The kings and their hosts) "And the Lord discomfitted them before Israel, and slew them with a great slaughter at Gibeon," etc.

Josh. x. 11 "And it came to pass as they fled from before Israel....that the Lord cast down great stones from heaven upon them ....and they died: they were more which died with hail stones, than they whom the children of Israel slew with the sword."

Josh. x. 32, 34, 37, 39. "Smote it (Lachish) with the edge of the sword, and all the souls, etc···All the souls that were therein (Eglon) he utterly destroyed that day....(Hebron and all the cities thereof) Destroyed it utterly, and all souls, etc....(Debir and all the cities thereof) utterly destroyed all souls that were therein."

Josh. xi. 8, 11, 12, 20 (Kings and hosts at waters of Merom,) "And the Lord delivered them into the hands of Israel who smote them until they left none....(Hazor) and they smote all the souls that were therein, utterly destroying them. He utterly destroyed them as Moses, the servant of the Lord, had commanded ....For it was of the Lord to harden their hearts....that he might destroy them utterly."

The Scriptures teach that the wicked shall be "consumed;" "devoured;" "slain;" "destroyed;" "smitten;" "die;" etc., on account of their sins and transgressions.

We have before us a terrible record of the utter destruction of men and women by scores and hundreds of thousands. They were not of "the seed of Abraham;" but "were aliens from the commonwealth of Israel," "strangers to the covenants of promise," "having no hope, and without God in the world." They were idolaters, and exceedingly wicked, and God destroyed them by the hands of the Israelites.

They were destroyed because of their transgressions; hence they have met the doom of the ungodly. I confess freely my conviction concerning them, that they are dead, they shall not rise. I have not the slightest faith that God will ever raise them from the dead and destroy them once more. It would be unmerciful, unjust, hence unlike God, who takes "no pleasure in the death of the wicked." God will not destroy man twice for his sins, for nowhere has he threatened such a thing.

I propose to send a few more articles on this side, and then shall present the few passages that seem to teach the resurrection of a part of the ungodly, unless the objections disappear as I study the word of God. My whole aim is to be on the side of truth. I have no one to please but the Lord, and feel willing through his grace, to make any sacrifice that he demands of me for the truth's sake. Yours in Christ.

Philadelphia, July 14.

AN EXPOSITION OF EZEK. XVIII. 4.

BY ELD. F. H. BURBANK.

"The soul that sinneth, it shall die." These words have been often quoted to prove the destruction of the wicked after a resurrection from the dead, on the ground that the wicked die once on account of Adam's transgression, and the second time on account of their own transgressions. This text, like many others that have been quoted to support such a view, I find, upon careful study, does not teach what has been asserted commonly, but, directly the opposite, and I will endeavor by the aid of the Holy Spirit to prove the point.

The prophet was living under the Law, the "Mosaic Law," that was given by God to Moses on Mount Sinia. The Law is recorded, as all know, in Exodus xx. 7–17. The two following chapters, as well as a number of chapters in Leviticus, contain a detailed list of crimes, (all of which the ten commandments cover) with penalties annexed. Those penalties are, "shall be surely punished;" "life for life;" "I will kill you with the sword;" "shall be surely put to death;" "shall be utterly destroyed, etc.;" all of which are expressed in the sentence, "The wages of sin is death;" or as Ezekiel declares, "The soul that sinneth, it shall die."

The children of Israel had a "sour grape" proverb, or theory, by which they taught that "the son should bear the iniquity of the father, and the father the iniquity of the son." Adam was not brought into the account at all by either prophet or people, and I do not believe they imagined such a thing, as that they had got to die for Adam's sins, but rather that they should die for each other's sins: the fathers for the children, and the children for the fathers. Their theory is "exploded" by the prophet, who declares, "The soul that sinneth, it shall die."

By comparing the eighteenth chapter of Ezekiel with the two chapters following the twentieth of Exodus, we can see at once that Ezekiel arraigns the criminal before Moses, and he receives sentence of death under that Law. The soul that sinneth, it shall die for its own sins: not after a resurrection from the dead, but put to death in this life. Amongst other passages, there is one in Deuteronomy which is quite conclusive on this point. Deut. xxiv. 14–16. "Thou shalt not oppress a hired servant that is poor and needy ....at his day thou shalt give him his hire, neither shall his sun go down upon it: lest he cry against thee unto the Lord, and it be sin unto thee. The father shall not be put to death for the children, neither shall the children be put to death for the fathers: every man shall be put to death for his own sin.

In Kings we have a stronger text than the preceding. 2 Kings. xiv. 5, 6. "And it came to pass, as soon as the kingdom was confirmed in his (Amariah's) hand, that he slew his servants which had slain the king, his father. But the children of the murderers he slew not: according unto that which is written in the law of Moses, wherein the Lord commanded, saying, The father shall not be put to death for the children, nor the children be put to death for the fathers, but every man shall be put to death for his own sin."

The law and its penalty had not changed in the interval that had elapsed (six hundred years) between the time of the giving of the Law and Amariah. We find that Amariah was not a subject of the "sour grape" theory. Two hundred and fifty years later, brings us to Ezekiel's day, and we find him contending against the "sour grape" theory. He re-iterated the declaration of Moses in Deut. xxiv. 14–16 as we have just read, and abides by the counsel of Amariah in 2 Kings xiv. 5, 6; which is the counsel of God.

We can make this still stronger by reading more of the prophecy. In the third chapter we learn that Ezekiel is made as a "watchman unto the house of Israel." God gives him instruction concerning his mission to the people, saying, "When I say unto the wicked, Thou shalt surely die; and thou givest him not warning, nor speakest to warn the wicked from his wicked way to save his life; the same wicked man shall die in his iniquity; but his blood will I require at thine hand. Yet if thou warn the wicked, and he turn not from his wickedness, nor from his wicked way, he shall die in his iniquity, but thou hast delivered thy soul."

If the phrase "die in his iniquity" is disputed as teaching the doom of the ungodly, the next chapter will decide that point. In that chapter the prophets described the seige of Jerusalem, and the chapter closes with the following words: "Son of man, behold I will break the staff of bread in Jerusalem: and they shall eat bread by weight and with care; and they shall drink water by measure, and with astonishment; that they may want bread and water, and be astonished one with another, and consume away FOR their iniquity. And, if the phrase "consume away" is disputed as teaching their death, Ezek. v. 12 will decide that point. It reads, "A third part of thee shall die with the pestilence, and with famine shall they be consumed away for their iniquity."

Thus God teaches in his word. His counsel shall stand. "Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his." As I have expressed before my conviction, I repeat it here, that I have no hold upon the Old Testament whatever to prove the theory of the resurrection of the wicked. There are a few passages in the New Testament that seem to favor that theory, and they have made me hesitate in regard to accepting the position of the "non re-living of the ungodly," as truth. My whole aim is to be on the side of truth. I left all once for Christ's sake, and I can do it again, if farther sacrifice is demanded. Dollars and cents, name and fame, friends and foes, riches and poverty, never stood between me and the cause of Christ, and to-day I neither fear man nor regard the devil, nor all that I have mentioned, so that I may be on the Lord's side. I love his cause none the less, and expect by the grace of God through faith in Jesus to obtain "an incorruptible crown." Yours in Christ.

HOW TO WORSHIP GOD.

It will at once be admitted by all who have paid the slightest attention to the subject, that intercourse between man and his Maker necessarily demands that the worshipper draw near the Being worshipped in a proper frame of mind—with feelings becoming the awful solemnity and importance of the occasion. Such a state of mind can only be maintained by a clear perception of the relation which Jehovah assumes while listening to the praises and supplications of his people. And what is that position? Is it the position of incomprehensible Deity? Do the fallen sons of earth, while presenting their petitions before the Most High, require to view him in all the matchless glory and majesty of his supreme and regal power? Alas! alas! were that the case, how could we—sinners of the human race, come before God? The very thought of such a meeting would so fill us with terror and confusion, as to destroy all power of utterance, and effectually prevent any intercourse between us and the object of adoration. But—blessed be his name—we are authorized to approach him in a very different manner—to regard him with feelings, not of terror, but of confidential love. He meets with his people in the relation of a Father, and authorizes them to address him as such. "When ye pray, say, Our Father which art in heaven."

It is by forgetting this truth, that a certain class of minds run into an error of the most prejudicial character, we mean, the error of seeking to dissociate themselves from terrestrial objects, while endeavoring to worship the Almighty. They imagine that in order to worship him acceptably they must, in spirit, enter the highest heavens, and in full view of the celestial throne, around which the seraphim with veiled face and feet, cease not to cry one to another, "Holy! holy! holy! is the Lord of Hosts, the whole earth is full of his glory," and there present their petitions. These devotional enthusiasts think they have only prayed acceptably, when they have obtained some undefinable and mysterious view of the "Invisible God;" and their great end in prayer is not so much to have their requests granted, as to have their feelings excited, and when such sensations fail to be produced, they sink down in despondency and sullenness, complaining that the Lord has hid his face.

All attempts to form adequate notions of the "Invisible God" must prove fruitless and vain. The distance between him and the highest order of his creatures is necessarily great—beyond all comprehension, how much further removed are we, who "are of yesterday and know nothing"—nothing, comparitively, of the appearances around us, and contemporary with ourselves, much less of the "things unseen." Jehovah has drawn an impenatrable veil between us and the glories of the sanctuary; and all attempts to pierce that veil are not only fruitless, but tend more than ever to obscure our vision. Any one who, even for a few moments, tries to form an idea of the duration, immensity, or power of the Deity, shall find his notions of the Infinite grow more dark and confused than before, and, should he continue the pursuit, speedily find himself lost in the transcending glories of "light ineffable." God has, indeed, favored us with some striking manifestations of his glorious majesty, and yet these are but mere and occasional glimpses; and any light they reflect on our minds, only discovers to us our own insignificance, and the impassable distance between us and the Being we adore. 'Tis perhaps for this reason that God has fixed the scene of our worship on earth amid terrestial objects; and condescended to place himself within the centre of human affections. He does not require us, even in spirit, to enter the "place where his honor dwelleth," and present our petitions there; but hiding from our sight the glories of the upper sanctuary, he, in his infinite condescension, "dwells as a father in the homes of earth."

But not only does the devout worshipper of God not require to ascend the regions of spirituality and celestial light to present his supplications before the Most High, inasmuch as God comes down to him; but he is required to possess the very humblest character himself. It is not with men of high thoughts that Jehovah deigns to dwell, it is only with the "humble and contrite." It is not as sages and philosophers that the people of God pour out their hearts' desires to their "Father in heaven," but as poor and needy beings, entirely dependant on him for every blessing they posess, or desire to obtain. If he stoops to hear their cry with a father's care, they must approach him with the helplessness and simplicity of children.

The Lord not only condescends to listen to his people's prayers as a father, he even authorizes us to address him as if he possessed like feelings with ourselves; to tell him all our wants in our common language, as to one related to us by the ties of human sympathy; yea, to plead with him, and ply him with motives, as if he required to be influenced by arguments. This is evident from instances of acceptable prayer, recorded for our benefit and example in the Holy Scriptures. Witness that striking instance mentioned in Exodus xxxii. 11–14, where we find Moses interceding on behalf of the rebellious Israelites in the following terms: "Lord, why doth thy wrath wax hot against thy people which thou hast brought out of the land of Egypt with great power and a mighty hand? Wherefore should the Egyptians speak, and say, For mischief did he bring them out, to slay them in the mountains, to consume them from the face of the earth? Turn thou away thy fierce wrath, and repent of this evil against thy people. Remember Abraham, Isaac and Israel thy servants, to whom thou swarest by thine own self, and saidst unto them, I will multiply your seed as the stars of heaven, and all this land will I give unto your seed, and they shall inherit it for ever. And the Lord repented of the evil which he thought to do unto his people."

It is plain, that the worship of God is altogether adapted to the condition of the worshipper. The creature is not required to adapt itself to the Creator, but the Creator stoops to the humble condition of the creature. The conduct of God to those who worship him, instead of countenancing the vague and wild notions of dreamy enthusiasts, who seek to worship God in a manner above and foreign to their nature, tends rather to localize our ideas, and confine our devout affections to the circle of earthly associations.

But it must be confessed, that some have a tendency to err in a contrary direction, abusing the Divine condescension by a wanton and irreverent mode of addressing the Supreme Jehovah. Often have we felt shocked and disgusted at the familiarity and irreverence manifested by such person, while presenting their desires to the Most High. They appeared to have forgotten that, while the Almighty condescends to listen to his people's prayers, and admit them to his presence on terms of friendship, it is only in the character of suppliants, not of companions; it is only for the purpose of hearing their requests, not that he might gratify their talkative propensities. Such indecorous worshippers justly incur the complaint, "Thou thoughtest I was altogether such an one as thyself." The conditions on which acceptable prayer is presented while encouraging the utmost freedom and confidence in the suppliant, gives no countenance whatever to an irreverent business-like familiarity; but, on the contrary, fill the mind of the petitioner with the deepest self-abasement, and the profoundest reverence towards the Host High. This must appear evident if we reflect that the medium of approach to the throne of grace is by a MEDIATOR. "No man," says Jesus, "cometh unto the Father but by me." It is in his name that all our petitions must be presented,—for his sake any blessing can be received by us. Thus, while the believer is encouraged to "draw near, in the full assurance of faith," he is at the same time kept in remembrance of his own worthlessness and vileness; and the only feelings that can posess his mind, regarding himself, are those of shame, guilt, and contrition. If he can only approach God through a Mediator, and obtain favors in his name, then he is himself destitute of all merit and claim on the Divine goodness; and he stands a beggar at the fountain of blessing: a beggar! nay, not so high, but a guilty one in the sight of God, and begs for mercy in the name of another.

The true spirit of human devotion is thus at utter variance with that of the dreamy enthusiast who effects to meet God in the air, and worship him with the feelings not of a human, but of an angelic nature, and alike opposed to the familiarities of common companionship. It is, in a word, a spirit of artless simplicity and authorized earnestness—united with self-abhorrence, shame, filial gratitude, and reverential awe. M.

GOD has not authorized man to suppress any part of what he has revealed; and it is impious presumption even to inquire into the expediency of such a procedure.—Bishop Whately.

ELD. SEYMOUR ON JOHN VI. 39.

My recent article headed "Positively Something New" has called forth a long reply from Br. A. N. Seymour. So much of his article as is not entirely irrelevant to the question which, in connection with my strictures, I invited him to discuss in our columns, is given below. My rejoinder purposely passes unnoticed many of Br. S.'s citations that have no bearing on the true interpretation of John vi. 39.—R. W.

"Thoughts like the foregoing [covering nearly three pages of foolscap.—R. W.] came into our mind as we took up our pen" to reply to Br. W.'s criticisms. As this is his request, or anxiety, I will endeavor to comply. I presented John vi. 39 as positive proof of the resurrection of all men in the last day. Br. W. says I am "prodigiously mistaken," "the righteous only are given." Give us the proof, my dear Sir, before you make another such a plunge. I am not a going to take your ipse dixit, be ye well assured of this. If others do, I shall not. I am trying to learn faith in God and obedience to the same, and not so much in man, for he has sought out many inventions. Now the text reads as follows: "And this is the Father's will which hath sent me, that of all which he hath given me I should lose nothing, but should raise it up again at the last day." Now, when this gift was presented to Christ, if it only embraced the righteous, then it must have been an exceeding small one, for when the gift was received there was scarcely a handful of righteous men on earth. Please read the 23d of Matt. if you doubt. Only a small remnant left, nearly all turned to be hypocrites; and then to think that only that small remnant that then existed will be raised in the last day! This can not possibly be the gift in full. It must, in the nature of the case, be more extensive; and the only way to determine what the Father has given to the Son, is to consult the Father's promise to him. That promise is in Ps. ii. 8: "Ask of me, and I shall give thee the heathen for thine inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession." This testimony is too clear to be misapprehended by any one. This gift has already been made, for Jesus says, "All power is given unto me both in heaven and in earth." Consequently, he commissions his Apostles to go into all nations "And preach the gospel," or in other words "Speak peace to the heathen," whom the Father promised to give him. Zech. ix. 10, belongs to no other dispensation but this, and here the prophet declares that Christ's "dominion shall be from sea to sea and from the rivers to the end of the earth." "All the ends of the world shall remember and turn unto the Lord; and all the kingdoms of the nations shall worship before thee. For the kingdom is the Lord's: and he is the governor among the nations." Ps. xxii. 27, 28. This also belongs to this dispensation. This boon was given to Christ under the curse. It is yet to be redeemed, Rev. xxii. 3. "All that the Father hath given me I shall lose nothing, but raise it up at the last day," John vi. 37, 39. "All that are in the graves shall hear his voice, and shall come forth," &c., the same as Lazarus, John v. 28, 29. "I....will draw all men unto me." John xii. 32. "He tasted death for every man," consequently has the "keys of hell and death," Rev. i. 18, Heb. ii. 9. "Who is the Saviour of all men, specially of those that believe." 1 Tim. iv. 10. He shall gather out of his kingdom all things that offend and them that do iniquity, Matt. xiii. 41. So with the gospel net; it is co-extensive with the field, which is the world. The net is full of good and bad when drawn to shore. Positively, then, all men, good or bad, are to have a resurrection in the "one hour" or "last day." Nothing is to be lost in consequence of the first death entailed upon Adam and his posterity. But the wicked will to be eternally lost, under the power of the second death.

Br. W. says the wicked are not described in John vi. Neither are the righteous; but both classes are referred to, for Christ addresses the multitude, believer and unbeliever. Surely they are not all righteous. Again, "All that the Father giveth me shall come to me; and him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out." John vi. 37. The Scriptures recognize two ways in coming to Christ, 1st, willingly, 2d, by compulsion. Those coming willingly have seen their rebellious course, heartily repented of their sins, and, with broken hearts, and contrite spirits, come seeking reconciliation to God through Jesus Christ. Such will be raised in the last day and come to Christ and receive eternal life. To the other class he said "Ye will not come to me, that ye might have life." Not natural life, for they had that. What life then? Everlasting life. This class must come by compulsion in that day (the same as Jeff. Davis, and hundreds of others, who seek to run away from justice), not to receive everlasting life, but to be judged unworthy of this infinite blessing. "Every knee shall bow and every tongue shall confess to God." But those who come willingly "he will in no wise cast out." When? When the reckoning day comes. The lawful inference from this promise is, that those who do not thus come will be cast out. What saith the word on the subject? "There shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth, when ye shall see Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, and all the prophets, in the kingdom of God, and you yourselves thrust out." Luke xiii. 28. "But the children of the kingdom shall be cast out into outer darkness: there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth." Matt. viii. 12. "And shall cast them into the furnace of fire," &c. Matt. xiii. 50. "And death and hell were cast into the lake of fire." "And whosoever was not found written in the book of life was cast into the lake of fire." Rev. xx. 14, 15. "But the fearful, and unbelieving, and the abominable, and murderers, and whoremonger's, and sorcerers, and idolaters, and all liars, shall have their part in the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone: which is the second death." Mark you well, God does not threaten this awful doom on the last remnant of wicked men living when Jesus comes, and leave the main body in their graves to go unwhipped of justice.....

You say, "It is worthy of your most 'critical attention' that, in John vi. 39, the verbs 'should love' and 'raised up again' (in Greek apollumi and anisteemi) stand in direct contrast. From this it follows that the loss referred to in this passage means remaining in death. Am I right on these two points?" No, I don't understand that you are right in either. "Should raise up," "should loose nothing," are two affirmative statements to support the proposition to raise all that was given to him; and that was all mankind, all that are in their graves, just and unjust. The signification of "apollumi," as given in Greenfield's Lexicon, is to leave, leave behind, pass, to be left, remain and "anistemi" signifies a rising up, resurrection. From these two words, then, we discover very clearly that God's determination is to raise up all the dead, that nothing is to be left behind, or lost, or remain in death. Again you say, "If I have correctly construed the verb 'should lose,' the Saviour must be understood as teaching that those whom he raises 'at the last day' will live forever." As you have misconstrued the Saviour's teaching, you must understand that the Saviour's teaching is, that this is the will of God, that every one that seeth the Son and believeth on him may have everlasting life, &c. But the wicked, utterly refusing the proffered gift and not coming to him for it on the condition specified in the gospel, must, at the judgment, as I have already stated, utterly perish in the lake of fire—lost, lost forever.

Now I believe I have replied to all that is necessary to reply to at present. So I conclude by saying, my brother, that you are prodigiously mistaken in your proofless assumption that in John vi. 39 only the righteous are given to Christ. "All (not a small remnant) that the Father giveth me shall come to me." You must not change the alls and shall comes in God's word to suit your non-resurrection theory. "Ask of me, and I shall give thee the heathen for thine inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession." The precious Bible is God's immutable detector, and you and I must abide by it like men. Submitted in christian love. A. N. SEYMOUR.

THE POPES.—The Roman correspondent of the London Morning Post, writing on the 17th ult., says:—"The artillery of the Castle of St. Angelo this morning announced to the Catholic world the commencement of the twentieth year of the present Pontiff's reign. Such a duration of power is, or rather has been, uncommon among the 258 Pontiffs who have occupied the chair of St. Peter in more or less uninterrupted succession for 1828 years, the medium of their reigns being 7 years, 1 month, and twenty five days. There is a superstitious tradition among the Romans that whenever a Pope shall reign for 25 years the end of the world will ensue. There have not been many Supreme Pontiffs the duration of whose reigns have approached this period. In the first century St. Peter, reckoning him as the first Pope, according to the Catholic calendar, was Bishop of Rome for 24 years and five months. It was not until the fifth century that a nearly similiar example of longevity was afforded in the person of St. Leo I., who died in 461, after a reign of 21 years. Three centuries more passed before any Pope reached the duration of a 20 years' reign. Pope Adrian I. died in 795, after having occupied the throne for 23 years; and St. Leo III. died in 816, after a reign of twenty years. The twelth century records the 21 years of Pope Alexander III.'s reign. He died in 1181. Six centuries elapsed before any other Pontiff attained a similiar duration in power; but Pius VI., elected in 1775, all but achieved the prophetic 25 years, and his successor, Pius VII., completed 23 years of somewhat stormy occupation of the Pontifical throne. It remains to be seen whether Pio Nono, whose health appears to be excellent just now, will be able to wield the Papal sceptre for a longer period than his predecessors, and thereby bring about 'the consummation of the age.'"

How They Stagger!

"It is said that 'immortality is something to be sought for: but why seek it, if the soul is immortal?' Immortality is the quality of never ceasing to exist, or exemption from death, and does not imply either happiness or misery. Now, as men seek only for that which they deem desirable, it cannot be merely existence that the apostle speaks of; but something to be desired in connection with that existence; hence, we may conclude with certainty that the word blissful added to it expresses the sense designed. This we think must be obvious to all." G.

So you find it necessary to "add" to the testimony of God; and "blissful" comes to your aid. But this helps you not; for, you have defined "immortality" to be "the quality of never ceasing to exist, or exemption from death." Now, the same apostle, in the same epistle, chap. vi. 23, saith "The wages of sin is death." Hence the wicked have not an "exemption from death," and therefore are not immortal, you being judge. But you say, "immortality does not imply either happiness or misery." This is a pure assumption, without a particle of proof in the Bible, or in philosophy. Misery—so far as we have any knowledge—is, invariably, connected with mortality and corruptibility. Show us an immortal creature that suffers if you can. We believe the thing is impossible—in the very nature of the case. Surely immortality—deathlessness—is something "desirable;" really worth seeking for. That state excludes all sorrow and pain; and hence implies the presence of all that is desirable. We do not need to add "blissful." It is blissful, indeed; and it is so because it is immortal, deathless, incorruptible; and it is gained only through Christ, the second Adam, and by a resurrec- at the last day. "I will raise him up at the last day," saith Jesus, four times in one discourse, John vi. Believe it, G., and rejoice in the truth, that Life, eternal life—even immortality and incorruptibility—is "the gift of God, through Jesus Christ" to all "them, who by patient continuance in well doing, seek for it."

A Sick Divinity.

EXTRACTS FROM A SERMON BY F., A. D. D.

"What is a man profited if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul."—Math. xvi. 26.

"The word rendered 'soul' in this text is rendered 'very life' in many passages of the Scriptures, having no other significance than natural life. We are obliged, therefore, in many passages, to depend upon the context to to find its meaning. In this text, however, it stands for the spirit—the latent principle that is within us all."

It is true the word rendered soul—psucheen—in this text, is rendered "life in many passages," &c. Why does F. assume that here "it stands for spirit?" He knows that pneuma is the Greek term for spirit; and the two terms psuche and pneuma are never used interchangeably in the Scriptures; but are entirely distinct. His assumption is purely gratuitous, and without any authority except his mere ipsi dixit. Luke tells us distinctly, chap. ix. 25, that the thing lost is the man "himself:" hence, that "life" proper is the loss spoken of. The same word occurs four times in Matt. xvi. 25, 26: twice rendered life and twice soul, the absurdity of which is manifest from Luke's version of the same discourse. F. gives not one solitary text of Scripture for his assumption. Again, he says—

"God intended, in the production of the human soul, that it should never die—that it should be endowed with immortal life—that its existence should be perpetual. The soul is never to die—never to cease to exist! It may die in the sense of being perverted, but not of perishing, so as to cease to be."

What "God intended" is one thing; and what will be the actual result is another, and may be a very different thing. This F. must admit, or he lands in Universalism; for he says, in the next sentence, "God made it for the enjoyment of Himself, to live with him forever." That is, "God intended" the soul to enjoy Himself forever. Will God's intention fail? will it be frustrated? F. and his associates in the belief of endless misery think, in this matter, God's intention may be frustrated. How then can they demonstrate—even if it be true that "God intended the human soul should never die"—that it will not die, yea, cease to exist? They cannot do it: they never have done it; and it is impossible for them ever to do it while the Scriptures abound in testimony that, "The soul that sinneth it shall die;" and "he that converteth the sinner from the error of his way shall save a soul from death." Ezk. xviii. 4, 20, and James v. 20. Not one text of Scripture has F. and his fellows in immortal-soulism in support of the bold assertion that "The soul is never to die—never to cease to exist," &c. Such assumptions contradict the testimony of the Spirit of God; and they are assuming a fearful responsibility who use them. Let them keep "to the law and the testimony," remembering that if they "speak not according to this word it is because there is no light in them." Isaiah viii. 20.

We tell these theologians once more, that unless they abandon their assumed premises, they are inevitably to be swept into Restorationism with their flocks. The God dishonoring doctrine of endless sin and suffering, as well as all after-life torment, will not bear the light: they are doomed to die: they are too sick to live. No wonder there are so many "Doctors of Divinity;" but the patient will die after all.

Children of the Resurrection.

BY ELD. F. H. BURBANK.

Luke xx. 36. "Children of God, being the children of the resurrection." These remarkable words of our blessed Master, are, in my opinion, an explicit declaration that all who are raised from the dead, will be the children of God, or in other words, that none but the children of God will have a resurrection. If every one is a child of God, then they shall be raised. But every one is not a child of God. We read in the Scriptures of two classes of children; "children of the wicked one;" "children of the kingdom;" "children of this world;" "children of light;" "children of wrath;" "dear children;" "cursed children;" "obedient children;" "children of God," and "children of the devil." This distinction is preserved throughout the Scriptures. We may easily ascertain who are the children of God by reading Rom. viii. 16. "The Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God." Therefore "every one that is led by the Spirit of God is a son of God." That Spirit is in us. "Now if any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his." "If the Spirit of him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, he that raised up Christ from the dead shall ALSO quicken your mortal bodies by (MAR. because of) his Spirit that dwelleth in you."

The Saducees thought to overthrow the doctrine of the resurrection by asking the Saviour the question concerning the woman who had seven husbands, saying "And the seven had her and left no seed: last of all the woman died also. In the resurrection therefore, when they shall rise, whose wife shall she be of them." Jesus answered, "Ye do err, not knowing the Scriptures nor the power of God ....They which shall be counted worthy to obtain that world, and the resurrection from the dead, neither marry nor are given in marriage: neither can they die any more; for they are equal unto the angels; and are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection." Christ confirms his doctrine by quoting from "Moses" the words "I am the God of Abraham," etc. Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and all their descendants who died in faith, were children of God. "God is not ashamed to be called their God." God "is not a God of the dead, but of the living, for THEY all live unto him." Hence as God is their God, and they his children, they shall never (not forever) perish, but be raised from the dead. They "are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection. Thus every one that is "accounted worthy to obtain that world," is accounted worthy of the resurrection, and on account of his having part in the resurrection, is called a child ot God. "I feel what then shall raise me up: The eternal Spirit dwells in me." The hope of the resurrection" is a "hope of life" to the believer. That hope is based upon a promise, and that promise is made doubly sure by the resurrection of Jesus Christ. Thus Christ "brought life and immortality to light," and it gives us a hope that is "big with immortality." Thus I have endeavored to give an exposition of the text, as an honest christian, who desires to be on the side of truth. No other exposition is satisfactory, for Christ certainly rests the weight of his argument upon the resurrection. The resurrection was the point in dispute; the dead was the party spoken of, and dead saints spoken of to prove the point. He says "Neither can they die any more, for they are equal unto the angels, and are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection."

CAMPBELL'S TRANS.—"The people of this world marry and are given in marriage; but among those who shall be honored to share in the resurrection, and the other world, there will be neither marrying nor giving in marriage. For they cannot die any more; for angel like, they are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection."

WHITBY; TRANS. and Notes.—"And being sons of the resurrection, are sons of God." "For this sonship imports the redemption of the body from corruption (Rom. viii. 23), and that they are sons, are heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ, and to be glorified with him....When it is said, 'God is not the God of the dead,' the meaning is, he is not the God of them who are to abide in a state of death, and never to enjoy the resurrection of the just; i. e., he owns not them for his, who are not to be 'sons of the resurrection,' and will not be called their God, as having not prepared for them a heavenly city. Heb. xi. 16. Hence the Scripturos say of them, that they 'are passed from death unto life,' (John v. 24) because Christ will raise them up at the last day. (John vi. 50) and, in the opinion of the Jews, they only seem to die, in the eyes of fools, because their hope is full of immortality, (Wis. iii. 2–4) and they proverbially say, the just live when they are dead.'"

Yours in Christ.

FROM W. S. CAMPBELL.

OTTO, ILLS., July 18, 1865.

Owing to the severe storm of wind and rain which prevailed in this county on Friday and Saturday last, we could effect nothing at our meeting till Sunday. We had then a beautiful and smiling sun, and the weather as cool as it should be the first of September. The people gathered from some distance around, and we endeavored to break to them the bread of life. Good attention was given, and a good interest manifested.

The grove was, indeed, a fine temple of worship. The great theme of life only in Christ was the burden of our labor; at the same time, we urged the approach of the kingdom of Christ as shown by the signs of the times. So great are the prejudices of the people, that we are obliged to labor much to remove the convictions concerning the immortality of the soul and future torment, which has become so deeply rooted. We are compelled to overthrow the positions that have been so long held, upon man and his destiny, and establish a broad, philosophical, and scriptural ground; then we can urge, and with effect, the testimony of the word, that the only hope of any life to come, is by a resurrection from among the dead, by the power of Christ, to the life which he has promised. We trust that many saw the force of arguments from scripture, by which we conclude that only the good will come to that condition which has been so surely promised to them as a class. Christ being "the resurrection and the life," and having the power committed to him to "raise up the dead" and "quicken whom he will," how can he become the power of the the resurrection to such as have no connection with him?

We do not—and most sincerely hope we never shall, by an attempt to keep in the beaten track and render our position agreeable to the tastes and old set notions of religionists—ignore the principles we have taught, nor stop at a point in the progress of thought upon the great plan, which make our instructions more contradictory and inharmonious with the word and incompatible with the developments of God's creatures, than the exploded opinions of the dark ages, which we believe we have forever left. We really think we have evidence to convince us that some professed friends are very willing to be counted in, till they can find an opportunity to improve from circumstances, in a manner to obtain their own personal advantage; then it may be very well to fall back upon the teachings of the "orignal faith" the sympathy of mongrel believers, who have never more than half left the darkness of the old theological wilderness where our fathers wandered—being deluded by the remains of popish dogmas, and which still remain.

It is not easy to bring people out from the bewildering, ignis fatuus exhalation playing over the marsh of old papal and heathen inculcation, viz, the doctrine of man's natural immortality and the conglomerate that has formed around it, and was necessary to it in the Romish church; and not much less in in the Protestant. Rome wanted her purgatory and torments of hell fire in another world, as well as torments in this world, to "scare sinners with:" in other words, to build up and perpetuate her own power and authority. Just so with the Protestant churches, who wish to use the doctrines of the gospel to scare sinners. Of course they wish to establish themselves more fully. The motives they use and the manner they employ, all tend to this result. Now, some of our friends who will always contend that the motives arising from the plain doctrine and inculcation of scriptures are not a sufficient motive to induce men to forsake sin and lead holy lives, are like those who will have something left to scare sinners with. Of what use is it to scare men? If men who profess to be Christians, and have been scared to it, would show any good fruit we should have better hope.

The doctrine we teach is spreading. Some good is being done. We start for a meeting three miles north of Lewistown, in a few days. The tent is to be pitched. We did not get it in season to use at our last meeting.

We shall be under the necessity of appealing to our brethren for farther material aid. If we feel, brethren, that the cause is the Lord's, let us rally to its support.

Reply to Eld. Seymour.

Br. Seymour professes to quote from my article the statement, "the righteous only are given." But no such language can be found in my article, and there is hence no reason why I should be called on for "the proof." What my brother refers to, however, is easily determined. An argument was offered by me to show him "that the wicked must be left out of" John vi. 39, and that, consequently, his contrary assumption was a "prodigiously mistaken" one. The minor premise of said argument was as follows: "But those, whom, according to the discourse in John vi. the Father hath given to Christ, are exclusively the righteous." It is in support of this assertion that Br. S., if his words have any meaning, now calls for evidence. The evidence was given in my former article, and no one was asked to accept the proposition upon my "ipse dixit." The extent of the Father's gift to Christ as set forth in the "discourse in John vi.," is what the argument was intended to define; and this fact should be distinctly understood. It was assumed as self-evident, that what is said of the gift to Christ in John vi. 39, must find its explanation, not in the prophetic utterances of the 2d Psalm (which I think Br. S. misapplies), but in other portions of the discourse of which the verse in question forms an important part. Br. S., though not venturing to find fault with this just principle, yet styles my procedure as "a plunge," and treats me as if I had attempted nothing at all in the way of sustaining my position with adequate proof. Nay, more; he treats me thus while he at the same time gives evidence that he feels the full force of the considerations that were urged against his "positively new" interpretation! And in his struggle to disprove the minor premise of my argument, he is forced to devise an interpretation of the thirty-seventh verse of John vi. which the structure of that verse stamps as being far-fetched and unnatural to the degree of downright absurdity. If this be called strong language, I insist that the case in hand fully justifies it. But let us see.

In my former article I affirmed, in substance, that the subjects of the resurrection affirmed in John vi. 39, are neither more nor less than those who in verse 37th are brought to view in the expression "All that the Father giveth me." The attentive reader of Br. Seymour's article will perceive that this position is admitted by him to be true. So far, then, we are agreed. And we are likewise, as a matter of course, agreed in the position, that in verse 37th the predicate "shall come to me" has for its subject the preceding "All" of the same verse. Furthermore, my brother conincides in my view, that in verse 37th the phrase "him that cometh to me" refers exclusively to the righteous. How, then, is it possible for Br. S. to evade the position, that only the righteous are the "All" of that verse? Readers of the HERALD OF LIFE! hearken to the astonishing answer! "The Scriptures recognize two ways in coming to Christ, 1st, willingly, 2d, by compulsion"! Thus does our good Br. S. cut the Gordian knot—untie it he never could.

"Two ways in coming to Christ"! both of them illustrated in John vi. 37! Well, really here is something to be looked at. If "a some what critical attention" to the non-resurrection question, on the part of Br. S., produces results so unlooked for by the theological world, what astounding disclosures in the field of exegesis may we not expect should he conclude to take a thoroughly "critical" survey of the merits of the Life controversy? But let us avail ourselves of our brother's discovery, and see what kind of a paraphrase it would give us of John vi. 37:—"All that the Father giveth me (i. e., the righteous and the wicked) shall come to me (that is, the righteous shall come "willingly" and the wicked shall come "by compulsion"); and him (i. e., the righteous) that cometh to me ("willingly") I will in no wise cast out." This paraphrase gives us Br. Seymour's explanation of John vi. 37, and it is manifestly the only explanation that can give the leat show of plausibility to his Voice of the West application of John vi. 39. But the paraphrase is open to criticism:

1. Its limitation of the phrase "him that cometh to me" to a smaller number than is represented by the phrase "All that the Father giveth me," is arbitrary and unnatural to the last degree. No one would ever dream of asserting that the paraphrase expresses the obvious meaning of the passage. The looseness that would sanction such liberties with plain language, would at the same time imperil every important truth taught in the Bible. I speak not of men, but of principles of interpretation.

2. If "two" kinds of coming to Christ are involved in John vi. 37, it is an unproved assumption of Br. Seymour's that the "willing" comer is the one denoted by the phrase "him that cometh to me."

3. It is untrue that a compulsory "coming to Christ" is taught in the Scriptures. Br. S. has asserted the contrary; now let him sustain his position with a "Thus saith the Lord," if he can. If he could thus sustain it, he would still be without a particle of warrant for asserting that John vi. 37 teaches the "coming to Christ" of a class whom the Saviour will "cast out."

Br. S. thinks that he cannot accept my explanation of the force of the verb "should lose" in John vi. 39. But he does accept it. At any rate, I am willing to indorse his understanding of the word; for he regards the phrase "should lose nothing" as denoting that of all which the Father hath given to the Son, according to John vi., nothing shall "remain in death." To which believers in Life for the righteous alone will all say Amen. Just settle it that the wicked are not in John vi. 39, and you have Br. S. helping you in the argument against their revival into life!

Br. S. represents me as saying in my former article that "the wicked are not described in John vi." I said nothing of the kind. The wicked are both "referred to" and "described" in that Chapter, and in such a way, too, as to make it certain that no power in heaven or earth will ever wake them up if they die in impenitence. Br. S. is also wrong in saying the righteous are not described in John vi. "How readest thou?"

Br. S.'s efforts to illustrate the meaning of "cast out" in John vi. 37, I regard as not to the purpose. The words "I will in no wise cast out" I regard as an assurance that our Lord will not reject any that come to him. The reference, as I understand the passage, is not to the future world, but to the present. Says Br. S., "The lawful inference from the promise is, that those who do not thus come will be cast out." Not so fast, my brother. My promise that I will never turn away from my door any who come to ask for bread, does not involve a threat that I will turn away such hungry ones as never come near me.

Having treated the three leading fictitious periods, we come to those that are real. The true Scripture numbers are these: the 2300 days of Daniel viii. 14, the time, times, and a half, of Daniel xii. 7, the 1290 days of Daniel xii 21, the 1335 days of Daniel xii. 12. As the argument on these decides as well for those of the Apocalypse we need not quote the latter. We have stated all of Daniel's periods because they are all subjected to one method of interpretation by the time-theorists, whom we oppose; and we have no doubt that the said method applies to all or to none, for they are clearly connected in the Prophecy. We refer to the year-day rule, by which the numbers are made to represent years instead of days. This rule is not established in the Scriptures, although two passages are adduced as proof—Numbers xiv. 34 and Ezek. iv. 2–6.

The first text occurs in the account of the the judgment pronounced on Rebellious Israel for accepting the evil majority report of the ten spies. "As truly as I live, saith YAHVEH, as ye have spoken in mine ears, so will I do to you; your carcasses shall fall in this wilderness; and all that were numbered of you, according to your whole number, from twenty years old and upward, who have murmured against me, doubtless ye shall not come into the land....and your children shall walk in the wilderness forty years, and bare your whoredoms, until your carcases be wasted in the wilderness. After the number of the days in which ye searched the land, even forty days, each day for a year, shall ye bear your iniquities, even forty years." What proof of the year-day system can be drawn from this passage? A glance at Daniel will show the difference between the assumed parallels. In Numbers, God uses the forty days as a rule to fix the number of judgment years, but when he foretells the time of punishment he states it exactly. He says "forty years"—not "forty days." Now in Daniel, there is not a word said of the rule by which the stated periods are fixed; only one thing is transacted, the fixing of the period itself. "How long?" is the question. The answer is direct: "Unto two thousand and three hundred days." "It shall be for a time, times, and a half." "From the time that the daily sacrifice shall be taken away, and the abomination that maketh desolate set up, there shall be a thousand two hundred and ninety days. Blessed is he that waiteth, and cometh to the thousand three hundred and five and thirty days." There is not a whisper in the Bible to authorize any one to alter this express word of God. God says "days," and in the absence of confirmatory authority it is vain to say "years." If the record in the wilderness had run thus—"Your children shall wander forty days"—the historical period of forty years would have established the year-day theory; but as God said "forty years" and it was "forty years," so God said "two thousand and three hundred "days," and "days" it is—"days" it will be.

The text in Ezekiel affords no argument different from that drawn from the passage in Numbers, and therefore needs no comment.

But we have something better to offer than a mere negative position: we have positive proof that the days of Daniel are literal. The argument on one period will suffice to establish the literality of all; we therefore take the 2300 days of Daniel viii. 13, 14. One consideration overthrows the position of year-day theorists on this text. To construct an interpretation of any plausibility they have to make "the vision concerning the daily sacrifice" represent a period distinct from and anterior to "the transgression of desolation," so as to begin the latter where the former ends. This makes "the vision concerning the daily sacrifice" refer to the time of the continuance of the sacrifice, whereas the text and prophecy show that it relates only to the period of its cessation. Let us quote. The "little horn waxed great, even to the host of heaven; and it cast down some of the host and of the stars to the ground, and stamped upon them. Yea, he magnified himself even to the prince of host, and by him the daily sacrifice was taken away, and the place of his sanctuary was cast down. And an host was given him against the daily sacrifice by reason of transgression, and it cast down the truth to the ground; and it practiced, and prospered."

It must be perceived at once that the vision related by Daniel has nothing whatever to say of the continuance of the daily sacrifice; it only speaks of its being taken away. Hence the question, "How long shall be the vision—the daily sacrifice?" unmistakeably refers to the period which begins at the taking away. If the question were—"How long the daily?" there might be room for the inference that the time of its continuance is asked; but the words "the vision" forever demonstrate that the inquiry only applies to the period of desistance. There are not two questions, but one—not two distinct periods in the vision, but one. "How long shall be the vision concerning the, daily sacrifice and the transgression of desolation, to give both the sanctuary and the host to be trodden under foot?" That is, "How long shall the little horn tread the sanctuary under foot from the time when he takes away the daily sacrifice?"

Verse 14 suggests another argument. To the propounded question the following answer is given: "Unto two thousand and three hundred days; then shall the sanctuary be cleansed." Now the original Hebrew is not "days," but "evening morning," as the margin has it. If "days" do not mean "years," from this promise is, that those who do not thus come will be cast out. What saith the word on the subject? "There shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth, when ye shall see Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, and all the prophets, in the kingdom of God, and you yourselves thrust out." Luke xiii. 28. "But the children of the kingdom shall be cast out into outer darkness: there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth." Matt. viii. 12. "And shall cast them into the furnace of fire," &c. Matt. xiii. 50. "And death and hell were cast into the lake of fire." "And whosoever was not found written in the book of life was cast into the lake of fire." Rev. xx. 14, 15. "But the fearful, and unbelieving, and the abominable, and murderers, and whoremonger's, and sorcerers, and idolaters, and all liars, shall have their part in the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone: which is the second death." Mark you well, God does not threaten this awful doom on the last remnant of wicked men living when Jesus comes, and leave the main body in their graves to go unwhipped of justice.....

You say, "It is worthy of your most 'critical attention' that, in John vi. 39, the verbs 'should love' and 'raised up again' (in Greek apollumi and anisteemi) stand in direct contrast. From this it follows that the loss referred to in this passage means remaining in death. Am I right on these two points?" No, I don't understand that you are right in either. "Should raise up," "should loose nothing," are two affirmative statements to support the proposition to raise all that was given to him; and that was all mankind, all that are in their graves, just and unjust. The signification of "apollumi," as given in Greenfield's Lexicon, is to leave, leave behind, pass, to be left, remain and "anistemi" signifies a rising up, resurrection. From these two words, then, we discover very clearly that God's determination is to raise up all the dead, that nothing is to be left behind, or lost, or remain in death. Again you say, "If I have correctly construed the verb 'should lose,' the Saviour must be understood as teaching that those whom he raises 'at the last day' will live forever." As you have misconstrued the Saviour's teaching, you must understand that the Saviour's teaching is, that this is the will of God, that every one that seeth the Son and believeth on him may have everlasting life, &c. But the wicked, utterly refusing the proffered gift and not coming to him for it on the condition specified in the gospel, must, at the judgment, as I have already stated, utterly perish in the lake of fire—lost, lost forever.

Now I believe I have replied to all that is necessary to reply to at present. So I conclude by saying, my brother, that you are prodigiously mistaken in your proofless assumption that in John vi. 39 only the righteous are given to Christ. "All (not a small remnant) that the Father giveth me shall come to me." You must not change the alls and shall comes in God's word to suit your non-resurrection theory. "Ask of me, and I shall give thee the heathen for thine inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession." The precious Bible is God's immutable detector, and you and I must abide by it like men. Submitted in christian love.

THE POPES.—The Roman correspondent of the London Morning Post, writing on the 17th ult., says:—"The artillery of the Castle of St. Angelo this morning announced to the Catholic world the commencement of the twentieth year of the present Pontiff's reign. Such a duration of power is, or rather has been, uncommon among the 258 Pontiffs who have occupied the chair of St. Peter in more or less uninterrupted succession for 1828 years, the medium of their reigns being 7 years, 1 month, and twenty-five days. There is a superstitious tradition among the Romans that whenever a Pope shall reign for 25 years the end of the world will ensue. There have not been many Supreme Pontiffs the duration of whose reigns have approached this period. In the first century St. Peter, reckoning him as the first Pope, according to the Catholic calendar, was Bishop of Rome for 24 years and five months. It was not until the fifth century that a nearly similiar example of longevity was afforded in the person of St. Leo I., who died in 461, after a reign of 21 years. Three centuries more passed before any Pope reached the duration of a 20 years' reign. Pope Adrian I. died in 795, after having occupied the throne for 23 years; and St. Leo III. died in 816, after a reign of twenty years. The twelth century records the 21 years of Pope Alexander III.'s reign. He died in 1181. Six centuries elapsed before any other Pontiff attained a similiar duration in power; but Pius VI., elected in 1775, all but achieved the prophetic 25 years, and his successor, Pius VII., completed 23 years of somewhat stormy occupation of the Pontifical throne. It remains to be seen whether Pio Nono, whose health appears to be excellent just now, will be able to wield the Papal sceptre for a longer period than his predecessors, and thereby bring about 'the consummation of the age.'"

How They Stagger!

"It is said that 'immortality is something to be sought for: but why seek it, if the soul is immortal?' Immortality is the quality of never ceasing to exist, or exemption from death, and does not imply either happiness or misery. Now, as men seek only for that which they deem desirable, it cannot be merely existence that the apostle speaks of; but something to be desired in connection with that existence; hence, we may conclude with certainty that the word blissful added to it expresses the sense designed. This we think must be obvious to all." G.

So you find it necessary to "add" to the testimony of God; and "blissful" comes to your aid. But this helps you not; for, you have defined "immortality" to be "the quality of never ceasing to exist, or exemption from death." Now, the same apostle, in the same epistle, chap. vi. 23, saith "The wages of sin is death." Hence the wicked have not an "exemption from death," and therefore are not immortal, you being judge. But you say, "immortality does not imply either happiness or misery." This is a pure assumption, without a particle of proof in the Bible, or in philosophy. Misery—so far as we have any knowledge—is, invariably, connected with mortality and corruptibility. Show us an immortal creature that suffers if you can. We believe the thing is impossible—in the very nature of the case. Surely immortality—deathlessness—is something "desirable;" really worth seeking for. That state excludes all sorrow and pain; and hence implies the presence of all that is desirable. We do not need to add "blissful." It is blissful, indeed; and it is so because it is immortal, deathless, incorruptible; and it is gained only through Christ, the second Adam, and by a resurrec at the last day. "I will raise him up at the last day," saith Jesus, four times in one discourse, John vi. Believe it, G., and rejoice in the truth, that Life, eternal life—even immortality and incorruptibility—is "the gift of God, through Jesus Christ" to all "them, who by patient continuance in well doing, seek for it."

A Sick Divinity.

EXTRACTS FROM A SERMON BY F., A. D. D.

"What is a man profited if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul."—Math. xvi. 26.

"The word rendered 'soul' in this text is rendered 'very life' in many passages of the Scriptures, having no other significance than natural life. We are obliged, therefore, in many passages, to depend upon the context to to find its meaning. In this text, however, it stands for the spirit—the latent principle that is within us all."

It is true the word rendered soul—psucheen—in this text, is rendered "life in many passages," &c. Why does F. assume that here "it stands for spirit?" He knows that pneuma is the Greek term for spirit; and the two terms psuche and pneuma are never used interchangeably in the Scriptures; but are entirely distinct. His assumption is purely gratuitous, and without any authority except his mere ipsi dixit. Luke tells us distinctly, chap. ix. 25, that the thing lost is the man "himself:" hence, that "life" proper is the loss spoken of. The same word occurs four times in Matt. xvi. 25, 26: twice rendered life and twice soul, the absurdity of which is manifest from Luke's version of the same discourse. F. gives not one solitary text of Scripture for his assumption. Again, he says—

"God intended, in the production of the human soul, that it should never die—that it should be endowed with immortal life—that its existence should be perpetual. The soul is never to die—never to cease to exist! It may die in the sense of being perverted, but not of perishing, so as to cease to be."

What "God intended" is one thing; and what will be the actual result is another, and may be a very different thing. This F. must admit, or he lands in Universalism; for he says, in the next sentence, "God made it for the enjoyment of Himself, to live with him forever." That is, "God intended" the soul to enjoy Himself forever. Will God's intention fail? will it be frustrated? F. and his associates in the belief of endless misery think, in this matter, God's intention may be frustrated. How then can they demonstrate—even if it be true that "God intended the human soul should never die"—that it will not die, yea, cease to exist? They cannot do it: they never have done it; and it is impossible for them ever to do it while the Scriptures abound in testimony that, "The soul that sinneth it shall die;" and "he that converteth the sinner from the error of his way shall save a soul from death." Ezk. xviii. 4, 20, and James v. 20. Not one text of Scripture has F. and his fellows in immortal-soulism in support of the bold assertion that "The soul is never to die—never to cease to exist," &c. Such assumptions contradict the testimony of the Spirit of God; and they are assuming a fearful responsibility who use them. Let them keep "to the law and the testimony," remembering that if they "speak not according to this word it is because there is no light in them." Isaiah viii. 20.

We tell these theologians once more, that unless they abandon their assumed premises, they are inevitably to be swept into Restorationism with their flocks. The God dishonoring doctrine of endless sin and suffering, as well as all after-life torment, will not bear the light: they are doomed to die: they are too sick to live. No wonder there are so many "Doctors of Divinity;" but the patient will die after all.

Children of the Resurrection.

BY ELD. F. H. BURBANK.

Luke xx. 36. "Children of God, being the children of the resurrection." These remarkable words of our blessed Master, are, in my opinion, an explicit declaration that all who are raised from the dead, will be the children of God, or in other words, that none but the children of God will have a resurrection. If every one is a child of God, then they shall be raised. But every one is not a child of God. We read in the Scriptures of two classes of children; "children of the wicked one;" "children of the kingdom;" "children of this world;" "children of light;" "children of wrath;" "dear children;" "cursed children;" "obedient children;" "children of God," and "children of the devil." This distinction is preserved throughout the Scriptures. We may easily ascertain who are the children of God by reading Rom. viii. 16. "The Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God." Therefore "every one that is led by the Spirit of God is a son of God." That Spirit is in us. "Now if any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his." "If the Spirit of him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, he that raised up Christ from the dead shall ALSO quicken your mortal bodies by (MAR. because of) his Spirit that dwelleth in you."

The Saducees thought to overthrow the doctrine of the resurrection by asking the Saviour the question concerning the woman who had seven husbands, saying "And the seven had her and left no seed: last of all the woman died also. In the resurrection therefore, when they shall rise, whose wife shall she be of them." Jesus answered, "Ye do err, not knowing the Scriptures nor the power of God ....They which shall be counted worthy to obtain that world, and the resurrection from the dead, neither marry nor are given in marriage: neither can they die any more; for they are equal unto the angels; and are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection." Christ confirms his doctrine by quoting from "Moses" the words "I am the God of Abraham," etc. Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and all their descendants who died in faith, were children of God. "God is not ashamed to be called their God." God "is not a God of the dead, but of the living, for THEY all live unto him." Hence as God is their God, and they his children, they shall never (not forever) perish, but be raised from the dead. They "are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection. Thus every one that is "accounted worthy to obtain that world," is accounted worthy of the resurrection, and on account of his having part in the resurrection, is called a child of God. "I feel what then shall raise me up: The eternal Spirit dwells in me." The hope of the resurrection" is a "hope of life" to the believer. That hope is based upon a promise, and that promise is made doubly sure by the resurrection of Jesus Christ. Thus Christ "brought life and immortality to light," and it gives us a hope that is "big with immortality." Thus I have endeavored to give an exposition of the text, as an honest christian, who desires to be on the side of truth. No other exposition is satisfactory, for Christ certainly rests the weight of his argument upon the resurrection. The resurrection was the point in dispute; the dead was the party spoken of, and dead saints spoken of to prove the point. He says "Neither can they die any more, for they are equal unto the angels, and are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection."

CAMPBELL'S TRANS.—"The people of this world marry and are given in marriage; but among those who shall be honored to share in the resurrection, and the other world, there will be neither marrying nor giving in marriage. For they cannot die any more; for angel like, they are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection."

WHITBY; TRANS. and Notes.—"And being sons of the resurrection, are sons of God." "For this sonship imports the redemption of the body from corruption (Rom. viii. 23), and that they are sons, are heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ, and to be glorified with him.... When it is said, 'God is not the God of the dead,' the meaning is, he is not the God of them who are to abide in a state of death, and never to enjoy the resurrection of the just; i. e., he owns not them for his, who are not to be 'sons of the resurrection,' and will not be called their God, as having not prepared for them a heavenly city. Heb. xi. 16. Hence the Scriptures say of them, that they 'are passed from death unto life,' (John v. 24) because Christ will raise them up at the last day. (John vi. 50) and, in the opinion of the Jews, they only seem to die, in the eyes of fools, because their hope is full of immortality, (Wis. iii. 2-4) and they proverbially say, the just live when they are dead.'"

OTTO, ILLS., July 18, 1865.

Owing to the severe storm of wind and rain which prevailed in this county on Friday and Saturday last, we could effect nothing at our meeting till Sunday. We had then a beautiful and smiling sun, and the weather as cool as it should be the first of September. The people gathered from some distance around, and we endeavored to break to them the bread of life. Good attention was given, and a good interest manifested.

The grove was, indeed, a fine temple of worship. The great theme of life only in Christ was the burden of our labor; at the same time, we urged the approach of the kingdom of Christ as shown by the signs of the times. So great are the prejudices of the people, that we are obliged to labor much to remove the convictions concerning the immortality of the soul and future torment, which has become so deeply rooted. We are compelled to overthrow the positions that have been so long held, upon man and his destiny, and establish a broad, philosophical, and scriptural ground; then we can urge, and with effect, the testimony of the word, that the only hope of any life to come, is by a resurrection from among the dead, by the power of Christ, to the life which he has promised. We trust that many saw the force of arguments from scripture, by which we conclude that only the good will come to that condition which has been so surely promised to them as a class. Christ being "the resurrection and the life," and having the power committed to him to "raise up the dead" and "quicken whom he will," how can he become the power of the the resurrection to such as have no connection with him?

We do not—and most sincerely hope we never shall, by an attempt to keep in the beaten track and render our position agreeable to the tastes and old set notions of religionists—ignore the principles we have taught, nor stop at a point in the progress of thought upon the great plan, which make our instructions more contradictory and inharmonious with the word and incompatible with the developments of God's creatures, than the exploded opinions of the dark ages, which we believe we have forever left. We really think we have evidence to convince us that some professed friends are very willing to be counted in, till they can find an opportunity to improve from circumstances, in a manner to obtain their own personal advantage; then it may be very well to fall back upon the teachings of the "orignal faith" the sympathy of mongrel believers, who have never more than half left the darkness of the old theological wilderness where our fathers wandered—being deluded by the remains of popish dogmas, and which still remain.

It is not easy to bring people out from the bewildering, ignis fatuus exhalation playing over the marsh of old papal and heathen inculcation, viz., the doctrine of man's natural immortality and the conglomerate that has formed around it, and was necessary to it in the Romish church; and not much less in in the Protestant. Rome wanted her purgatory and torments of hell fire in another world, as well as torments in this world, to "scare sinners with:" in other words, to build up and perpetuate her own power and authority. Just so with the Protestant churches, who wish to use the doctrines of the gospel to scare sinners. Of course they wish to establish themselves more fully. The motives they use and the manner they employ, all tend to this result. Now, some of our friends who will always contend that the motives arising from the plain doctrine and inculcation of scriptures are not a sufficient motive to induce men to forsake sin and lead holy lives, are like those who will have something left to scare sinners with. Of what use is it to scare men? If men who profess to be Christians, and have been scared to it, would show any good fruit we should have better hope.

The doctrine we teach is spreading. Some good is being done. We start for a meeting three miles north of Lewistown, in a few days. The tent is to be pitched. We did not get it in season to use at our last meeting.

We shall be under the necessity of appealing to our brethren for farther material aid. If we feel, brethren, that the cause is the Lord's, let us rally to its support.

Reply to Eld. Seymour.

Br. Seymour professes to quote from my article the statement, "the righteous only are given." But no such language can be found in my article, and there is hence no reason why I should be called on for "the proof." What my brother refers to, however, is easily determined. An argument was offered by me to show him "that the wicked must be left out of" John vi. 39, and that, consequently, his contrary assumption was a "prodigiously mistaken" one. The minor premise of said argument was as follows: "But those, whom, according to the discourse in John vi. the Father hath given to Christ, are exclusively the righteous." It is in support of this assertion that Br. S., if his words have any meaning, now calls for evidence. The evidence was given in my former article, and no one was asked to accept the proposition upon my "ipse dixit." The extent of the Father's gift to Christ as set forth in the "discourse in John vi.," is what the argument was intended to define; and this fact should be distinctly understood. It was assumed as self-evident, that what is said of the gift to Christ in John vi. 39, must find its explanation, not in the prophetic uterances of the 2d Psalm (which I think Br. S. misapplies), but in other portions of the discourse of which the verse in question forms an important part. Br. S., though not venturing to find fault with this just principle, yet styles my procedure as "a plunge," and treats me as if I had attempted nothing at all in the way of sustaining my position with adequate proof. Nay, more; he treats me thus while he at the same time gives evidence that he feels the full force of the considerations that were urged against his "positively new" interpretation! And in his struggle to disprove the minor premise of my argument, he is forced to devise an interpretation of the thirty-seventh verse of John vi. which the structure of that verse stamps as being far-fetched and unnatural to the degree of downright absurdity. If this be called strong language, I insist that the case in hand fully justifies it. But let us see.

In my former article I affirmed, in substance, that the subjects of the resurrection affirmed in John vi. 39, are neither more nor less than those who in verse 37th are brought to view in the expression "All that the Father giveth me." The attentive reader of Br. Seymour's article will perceive that this position is admitted by him to be true. So far, then, we are agreed. And we are likewise, as a matter of course, agreed in the position, that in verse 37th the predicate "shall come to me" has for its subject the preceding "All" of the same verse. Furthermore, my brother conincides in my view, that in verse 37th the phrase "him that cometh to me" refers exclusively to the righteous. How, then, is it possible for Br. S. to evade the position, that only the righteous are the "All" of that verse? Readers of the HERALD OF LIFE! hearken to the astonishing answer! "The Scriptures recognize two ways in coming to Christ, 1st, willingly, 2d, by compulsion"! Thus does our good Br. S. cut the Gordian knot—untie it he never could.

"Two ways in coming to Christ"! both of them illustrated in John vi. 37! Well, really here is something to be looked at. If "a some what critical attention" to the non-resurrection question, on the part of Br. S., produces results so unlooked for by the theological world, what astounding disclosures in the field of exegesis may we not expect should he conclude to take a thoroughly "critical" survey of the merits of the Life controversy? But let us avail ourselves of our brother's discovery, and see what kind of a paraphrase it would give us of John vi. 37:—"All that the Father giveth me (i. e., the righteous and the wicked) shall come to me (that is, the righteous shall come "willingly" and the wicked shall come "by compulsion"); and him (i. e., the righteous) that cometh to me ("willingly") I will in no wise cast out." This paraphrase gives us Br. Seymour's explanation of John vi. 37, and it is manifestly the only explanation that can give the leat show of plausibility to his Voice of the West application of John vi. 39. But the paraphrase is open to criticism:

1. Its limitation of the phrase "him that cometh to me" to a smaller number than is represented by the phrase "All that the Father giveth me," is arbitrary and unnatural to the last degree. No one would ever dream of asserting that the paraphrase expresses the obvious meaning of the passage. The looseness that would sanction such liberties with plain language, would at the same time imperil every important truth taught in the Bible. I speak not of men, but of principles of interpretation.

2. If "two" kinds of coming to Christ are involved in John vi. 37, it is an unproved assumption of Br. Seymour's that the "willing" comer is the one denoted by the phrase "him that cometh to me."

3. It is untrue that a compulsory "coming to Christ" is taught in the Scriptures. Br. S. has asserted the contrary; now let him sustain his position with a "Thus saith the Lord," if he can. If he could thus sustain it, he would still be without a particle of warrant for asserting that John vi. 37 teaches the "coming to Christ" of a class whom the Saviour will "cast out."

Br. S. thinks that he cannot accept my explanation of the force of the verb "should lose" in John vi. 39. But he does accept it. At any rate, I am willing to indorse his understanding of the word; for he regards the phrase "should lose nothing" as denoting that of all which the Father hath given to the Son, according to John vi., nothing shall "remain in death." To which believers in Life for the righteous alone will all say Amen. Just settle it that the wicked are not in John vi. 39, and you have Br. S. helping you in the argument against their revival into life!

Br. S. represents me as saying in my former article that "the wicked are not described in John vi." I said nothing of the kind. The wicked are both "referred to" and "described" in that Chapter, and in such a way, too, as to make it certain that no power in heaven or earth will ever wake them up if they die in impenitence. Br. S. is also wrong in saying the righteous are not described in John vi. "How readest thou?"

Br. S.'s efforts to illustrate the meaning of "cast out" in John vi. 37, I regard as not to the purpose. The words "I will in no wise cast out" I regard as an assurance that our Lord will not reject any that come to him. The reference, as I understand the passage, is not to the future world, but to the present. Says Br. S., "The lawful inference from the promise is, that those who do not thus come will be cast out." Not so fast, my brother. My promise that I will never turn away from my door any who come to ask for bread, does not involve a threat that I will turn away such hungry ones as never come near me.

Having treated the three leading fictitious periods, we come to those that are real. The true Scripture numbers are these: the 2300 days of Daniel viii. 14, the time, times, and a half, of Daniel xii. 7, the 1290 days of Daniel xii. 21, the 1335 days of Daniel xii. 12. As the argument on these decides as well for those of the Apocalypse we need not quote the latter. We have stated all of Daniel's periods because they are all subjected to one method of interpretation by the time-theorists, whom we oppose; and we have no doubt that the said method applies to all or to none, for they are clearly connected in the Prophecy. We refer to the year-day rule, by which the numbers are made to represent years instead of days. This rule is not established in the Scriptures, although two passages are adduced as proof—Numbers xiv. 34 and Ezek. iv. 2–6.

The first text occurs in the account of the the judgment pronounced on Rebellious Israel for accepting the evil majority report of the ten spies. "As truly as I live, saith YAHVEH, as ye have spoken in mine ears, so will I do to you; your carcasses shall fall in this wilderness; and all that were numbered of you, according to your whole number, from twenty years old and upward, who have murmured against me, doubtless ye shall not come into the land....and your children shall walk in the wilderness forty years, and bare your whoredoms, until your carcases be wasted in the wilderness. After the number of the days in which ye searched the land, even forty days, each day for a year, shall ye bear your iniquities, even forty years." What proof of the year-day system can be drawn from this passage? A glance at Daniel will show the difference between the assumed parallels. In Numbers, God uses the forty days as a rule to fix the number of judgment years, but when he foretells the time of punishment he states it exactly. He says "forty years"—not "forty days." Now in Daniel, there is not a word said of the rule by which the stated periods are fixed; only one thing is transacted, the fixing of the period itself. "How long?" is the question. The answer is direct: "Unto two thousand and three hundred days." "It shall be for a time, times, and a half." "From the time that the daily sacrifice shall be taken away, and the abomination that maketh desolate set up, there shall be a thousand two hundred and ninety days. Blessed is he that waiteth, and cometh to the thousand three hundred and five and thirty days." There is not a whisper in the Bible to authorize any one to alter this express word of God. God says "days," and in the absence of confirmatory authority it is vain to say "years." If the record in the wilderness had run thus—"Your children shall wander forty days"—the historical period of forty years would have established the year-day theory; but as God said "forty years" and it was "forty years," so God said "two thousand and three hundred "days," and "days" it is—"days" it will be.

The text in Ezekiel affords no argument different from that drawn from the passage in Numbers, and therefore needs no comment.

But we have something better to offer than a mere negative position: we have positive proof that the days of Daniel are literal. The argument on one period will suffice to establish the literality of all; we therefore take the 2300 days of Daniel viii. 13, 14. One consideration overthrows the position of year-day theorists on this text. To construct an interpretation of any plausibility they have to make "the vision concerning the daily sacrifice" represent a period distinct from and anterior to "the transgression of desolation," so as to begin the latter where the former ends. This makes "the vision concerning the daily sacrifice" refer to the time of the continuance of the sacrifice, whereas the text and prophecy show that it relates only to the period of its cessation. Let us quote. The "little horn waxed great, even to the host of heaven; and it cast down some of the host and of the stars to the ground, and stamped upon them. Yea, he magnified himself even to the prince of host, and by him the daily sacrifice was taken away, and the place of his sanctuary was cast down. And an host was given him against the daily sacrifice by reason of transgression, and it cast down the truth to the ground; and it practiced, and prospered."

It must be perceived at once that the vision related by Daniel has nothing whatever to say of the continuance of the daily sacrifice; it only speaks of its being taken away. Hence the question, "How long shall be the vision—the daily sacrifice?" unmistakeably refers to the period which begins at the taking away. If the question were—"How long the daily?" there might be room for the inference that the time of its continuance is asked; but the words "the vision" forever demonstrate that the inquiry only applies to the period of desistance. There are not two questions, but one—not two distinct periods in the vision, but one. "How long shall be the vision concerning the, daily sacrifice and the transgression of desolation, to give both the sanctuary and the host to be trodden under foot?" That is, "How long shall the little horn tread the sanctuary under foot from the time when he takes away the daily sacrifice?"

Verse 14 suggests another argument. To the propounded question the following answer is given: "Unto two thousand and three hundred days; then shall the sanctuary be cleansed." Now the original Hebrew is not "days," but "evening morning," as the margin has it. If "days" do not mean "years," how much less do "evening morning"! Let us collate two passages relating to the Mosaic sacrifices, that the force of "evening morning" may be felt. "This is the offering of Aaron and of his sons, which they shall offer unto the Lord in the day when he is anointed; the tenth part of an ephah of fine flour for a meat offering perpetual, half it in the morning, and half thereof at night"—or "evening." Lev. vi. 20. "And Zadok the priest, and his brethren the priests, before the tabernacle of the Lord in the high place that was at Gibeon, to offer burnt offerings unto the Lord upon the altar of the burnt offering continually, morning and evening." 1 Chron. xvi. 40. Now we maintain that "evening morning" in the text must be just as literal as the same phrase in the two quoted passages, for in both cases the relation is the same. The question and answer are firmly connected. In the vision, Daniel sees the little horn take away the daily sacrifice. Then occurs the question,—"How long the vision concerning the daily sacrifice?" That is, How long shall the little horn tread under foot the daily sacrifice? How long from the discontinuance of the daily sacrifice? Then comes the answer—Two thousand three hundred evening morning sacrifices shall be prevented by the dominance of the little horn. It is an utter impossibility to get any other meaning from it.

Still another argument is suggested by verse 17. "And it came to pass, when I, even I Daniel, had seen the vision, and sought for the meaning, then, behold, there stood before me as the appearance of a man. And I heard a man's voice between the banks of Ulai, which called, and said,—Gabriel, make this man to understand the vision. So he came near where I stood; and when he came, I was afraid, and fell upon my face: but he said unto me, Understand, O son of man; for at the time of the end shall be the vision." This is "the vision concerning the daily sacrifice, "for it would not do to say that the whole vision is referred to: else Media and Persia and Grecia as spoken of in the end of the chapter would have to come up in the future. It is clear that the "2300 evening morning" belongs to "the time of the end." Year-day theorists say that the time of the end began in A. D. 1792; if so, the 2300 years must begin at that date: whereas, taking the literal time, there is no difficulty.

Yet another argument arises in verse 26. "The vision of the evening and morning which was told is true: wherefore shut thou up the vision; for it shall be for many days." That is, the taking away of the daily sacrifice for 2300 evening morning is true, but shut thou up the vision, for many days will elapse before the period of its fulfilment will arrive; at the time of the end shall be the vision.

Thus before the simplicity of the truth the year-day system of interpretation melts away as snow before the vernal sun. So may all error speedily dissolve, O YAHVEH! J. T. C.

Our Strange Friend Again.

NEW YORK, July 22, 1865.

TO THE ED. OF HER. OF LIFE, SIR:—By your favor I am in possession of your last number, in which I perceive that you inserted my note and made remarks, which on the whole are courteous; but justice demands some explanation. The debate to which I alluded, was not as you suppose, and as I thought, between two individuals, but between whosoever jumps up first to defend or assail spiritualism; hence your people did not intrude where they were not invited; but they intruded their opinions where not called for. The spiritualists contended that the word of God is a mere nothing to their inspirations and revelations. The reply to this need not call forth the question whether the souls of the wicked will suffer or live.

As to myself, though I shrink not from defending what I believe to be vital truth, yet I would not engage in a discussion at present. You will observe I said, "I should much like to HEAR one well conducted discussion." There are two reasons why I would not debate myself. 1st, I am not acquainted, except by hearsay, with what your opinions really are 2d, I do not believe them to be such heresy as to deserve any thing more than kind, Christian, quiet argument as to what saith the Lord; and though I believe you err in regard to the punishment of the wicked, yet as you believe in God manifest in the flesh, who suffered, died, and rose again that we may be saved, this glorious faith entitles you to be considered as a child of God. The last words of your "remarks," on my note, show that you are so wedded to your opinions as to hold every one of them of such mighty importance as to consider those to be "opponents to the bible testimony" who think differently from you. This is to be regretted; but then it calls forth the virtue of forbearance, and this for Christ's sake shall be extended to all who love his name, by PHILALETHUS.

REMARKS BY THE EDITOR.—Our strange friend now concedes that the persons holding our views did not intrude by speaking in the discussion a week ago last Sunday; "but they intruded their opinions when not called for." That, our friend must admit, is a mere matter of opinion. And as the Chairman did not decide them out of order, we cannot say they were so. We differ from "PHILALETHUS" as to the manner of meeting Spiritualists. Demonstrate that "the dead know not anything," and that "there is no knowledge in sheol," and Spiritualism is proved to be mere conjuration or the work of the devil.

We reciprocate our friend's "forbearance;" but unfortunately he sees occasion for it where we discover none. We think we expressed no such sentiment as he attributes to us, when he says "you consider those to be opponents to the Bible testimony who think differently form you." If he will read our remarks again, he will see that all we said was, if a "debate" is to be had, we should "hold an opponent to the Bible testimony;" by which we simply intended, we should not allow one who should debate with us to wander from the Bible into "vain philosophy," as most do who oppose our views, in their endeavors to overthrow our arguments.

Tradition and Ancient Chronology.

It was the condemnation of the Jewish Pharisees and Scribes that they departed from the word of God and followed traditions of the Elders, making the word of God, the Scriptures, of none effect by their traditions.

As it was with the Scribes and Pharisees in the time of our Lord's first advent, so it seems to be in these days, and probably so it will continue to be until his second advent.

In regard to the opinion which so entirely prevails, that this dispensation will end when the "world that now is" shall be just 6000 years old. Is this a tradition of the Elders or fathers? or is it scripture? if it is scripture, where is the authority? or where the passages which warrant such a belief? If it is not scripture, but a tradition of the Jews, handed down to us through Dr. Adam Clarke and others before him, how much is it worth? Is a Jewish tradition, or a tradition handed down from the Fathers of this dispensation worth any more to us than the traditions of the Elders were worth to the Scribes and Pharisees?

By Fathers here, I do not mean inspired men who wrote the book of Acts and the Epistles, they were Apostles; but I mean those who succeeded them, and they may have been their immediate successors or even contemporary with the apostles, even as far back as Barnabas who I have heard quoted as authority, but when we go back as far as Barnabas, why not step, as it were, just across the street and consult the apostles, whose authority is unquestioned.

This going back only to the fathers to prove a favorite theory, whether it be a pre or a post millenium, or the 6000 years, or anything else, if it reaches back no farther than that, what is it worth? Is it really of any more value to us than the traditions of the Elders were to the Scribes and Pharisees? and if of no more value, why build a theory upon tradition which cannot be sustained by scripture?

Now it may be that this idea of the 6000 years has a scriptural basis; if so, I would be glad to see it produced, but, if it is not scripture, it should be worth to us just as much as any other tradition, and no more. Consequently a time argument based upon the 6000 year idea is of no more value than any other theory which has only tradition for a basis.

That the early chronology of the Hebrew copies, from which our version of the Scriptures is translated is materially defective there are good reasons to believe is the case, and the evidence is of too grave a character to be lightly esteemed or set aside without a candid examination. If it can be proved that there is a defect in the chronology of our version of several hundred years, it is manifest that any time argument based upon such defective chronology must mislead and prove to be erroneous, and consequently sadly injurious to the cause of truth. I therefore propose to transcribe the argument, accompanied with Chronologcal tables, of an author, who has given this subject great research, and is entitled to our candid consideration presenting the subject chiefly in his own language, condensing only as much as will suffice to present fairly his chain of evidence, let it be candidly and critically examined by the readers and let the argument stand or fall on its own merits, truth being our only object and aim. Referring to table No 1, and Gen. v. 2–26, vii. 11, the reader will at once perceive, that, according to the authorized English translation, and the Hebrew text from which it was made, 1656 years elapsed from the creation to the flood; that the Septuagint estimate of this period is greatly extended. From Adam to Mahalaleel, five successive generations, this version makes each Patriarch one hundred years older than the Hebrew. In the case of Enoch, the Septuagint has one hundred years, and in the case of Lamech six years more than the Hebrew; the Septuagint on the whole period, giving us four hundred and six years more than the Hebrew.

In the second table, which illustrates the period after the flood we are first struck by the appearance of Cainan in the Septuagint table, what is not found in either the Hebrew or the Samaritan, and which gives an addition to the period of 130 years. Here we find six successive Patriarchs according to the Hebrew, to whose ages prior to the birth of their eldest sons respectively the Samaritan and the Septuagint agree in adding 100 years each, and to Nahor these two Versions add 50 years.

From this date it appears, that in the postdiluvian period the Hebrew gives us but 292 years, while the Samaritan has nine hundred and forty-two, and the Septuagint one thousand and seventy-two years. Showing a difference from the creation to the birth of Abraham, in the Septuagint more than the Hebrew 1386 years. Then chronological differences are so great, that no historical scheme applicable to one, can be accommodated to the other. They are sufficient to derange the entire scope and connection of the historical record which refer to these times.

To explain this to those who have not studied the subject, it will be necessary to observe, that, for some time before the introduction of Christianity, the professors of the Mosaic religion had been divided into three distinct and independant communities. Each of these had a temple as the centre of their worship: a recognized copy of the Holy Scriptures in their own language: and each regarded the other two with feelings of the most raucorous jealousy. These were:

1. The Hebrew Jews, who worshipped at Jerusalem, and who are generally supposed to have used the square characters of the present Hebrew Bible.

2. The Samaritans, whose temple was situated on Mount Gerizim, who used a Syriac dialect with Phœnecian characters; these received no part of holy writ except the five books of Moses.

3. The Hellenistic Jews of Egypt, whose usual language and characters were Greek. They had their temple at Heliopolis.

The opinions now generally received among critics, respecting the existing HEBREW text, is, that it was written in its present character, which is Chaldean about the time of Ezra, and it is inferred that Ezra, when he reformed the Jewish church, transcribed the ancient characters of the Hebrews into the square letters of the Chaldeans: for the use of those Jews, who, being born during the captivity, knew no other alphabet than that of the people among whom they had been educated. Consequently, the old character, which we call Samaritan, fell into total disuse. Confirmation of this point is to be found in the ancient Hebrew coins, which were struck before the captivity, the characters engraven on all of them are the same as the modern Samaritan. See Horne's introduction. Vol. 1, page 190, Am. Ed.

The text thus produced, remained without material alteration until about the time of Christ; when, in consequence of the prevalence of the Greek language, the Hebrew scriptures were almost entirely neglected.

The SEPTUAGINT, or first Greek version of the Scriptures was made at Alexandria, in Egypt. It was made from the original Hebrew about B. C. 280; it was recognized as a correct version by the highest Jewish authorities, and by their sanction introduced into the Synagogue, and it remained thus unchallenged for nearly four hundred years as a faithful translation of the original scriptures. It is a translation of the Hebrew scriptures as they were held by the Jews who lived under the second temple, and who, at that time, were the trustees to whom were committed the oracles of God.

It is more than this: not only was its original the book of scripture as held by the then existing church of God, but the translation also received the unqualified approbation of the church. The high priest and the Sanhedrim approved the Septuagint, and authorized its use in all the synagogues where the Greek language was spoken.—Dr. H. Owen's Inquiry, page 6.

Philo Judaeus, who lived in the the age of the apostles, asserts "that the Hebrews who knew the Greek language, and the Greeks who understood the Hebrew were so struck with admiration at the entire agreement between the original and the translation, that they not only adored them as sisters, but as one and the same, both in word and things; styling the translators not only accurate scholars, but inspired interpreters and prophets, who, with a singular purity of spirit, had entered into the very sentiments of Moses." Let it be remembered that Philo was an eminent literary writer on Sacred history he must, therefore, have been well acquainted with the Hebrew scriptures, and with the Septuagint version. Can we, then, in such circumstances imagine that, either when the translation was made, or in the days of Philo, (in the apostolic age) the Hebrew and Greek numbers differed by one thousand three hundred and eighty-six years? Is it possible that either the Sanhedrim or the historian could have overlooked so important a discrepancy? This improbability amounts almost to an impossibillity, when we consider that the Septuagint was not confined to the closets of the learned, but was generally known throughout the length and breadth of Judea, and was publicly read in the synagogues. The Septuagint was the version from which our Saviour quoted, being the only one in common use among the people at large, the Hebrew being confined to the learned. Thus it received his sanction and of the apostles also after his ascension. But there is other evidence which not only goes to prove, that, down to the beginning of the first century, the Hebrew and Septuagint chronologies were identical, but also shows that the numbers then received were the same as are now found in the Septuagint.

WORKING CHRISTIANS.—Learn to be workngi Christians. "Be ye doers of the word, and not hearers only, deceiving your own selves." It is very striking to see the usefulness of many Christians. Are there none of you who know what it is to be selfish in your Christianity? You have seen a selfish child go into a secret place to enjoy some delicious morsel undisturbed by his companions. So it is with some Christians. They feed upon Christ and forgivingness; but it is alone, and all for themselves.

Are there not some of you who can enjoy being a Christian, while your dearest friend is not, and yet you will not speak to him? See here you have got work to do. When Christ found you He said, "Go, work in my vineyard." What were you hired for, if not to spread salvation? What blessed for? O, my Christian friends! how little you live as though you were the servants of Christ! How much idle time and idle talk you have! This is not like a good servant. How many things you have to do for yourself! how few for Christ and his people! This is not like a servant.—McCheyne.

Letters and Extracts.

From Samuel J. Brimhall.

MAPLETON, KANSAS, July 9, 1865.

BR. STORRS:—We are in great need of a Minister in this portion of Kansas. We need a watchman clad with the christian panoply and armed with a whole gospel; able to give it to the people clothed with the spirit and with power. The truth is suffering for want of such a man, and the community in this vicinity and its surroundings are suffering far worse for the need of it. There are four denominations represented in this place (viz) Episcopal, Protestant Methodist, Presbyterian, and Campbellites; and the people listen to the preacher of one denomination one sabbath and another the next, the month round, and then commence again; and with all this spiritual food the people are starving to death; some are dead already, and others twice dead and plucked up by the roots.

My nearest neighbor is an Episcopal Methodist Minister, a good bible historian, and is tenacious for the truth and his way of it. He told me to day that he would sacrifice his life rather than have the doctrine of the immortality of the soul go down; because that, said he, is the foundation of all our doctrine. Another, a Protestant Methodist Minister, whom I invited home with me last Sabbath, stated that this doctrine of soul sleeping unconsciousness in death, and kindred doctrines, got up by Storrs, Miller, Litch, and others, was making more infidels and deists than Paine's "Age of Reason." He said he had read Josiah Litch's works, had them now, and kept them to refer too as a theological curiosity. The mass of the people are fully apprized of the fallacy of the present style of preaching, and the result of it is plain to be seen.

I am confident that the truth would be listened to with the best attention and by good congregations. The doctrine of no future life to the wicked would be entirely new in this place. I had hoped Eld. Thos. W. Smith would have got out here this summer; but I fear he will fail to reach us, and we do want some one to come. If we can't get one of the best preachers we will be thankful for one not so good. Yet we do not want the cause injured nor the way of truth evil spoken of.

If this call should reach any Ministering brother that will come, and wishes to know concerning this country, he may address me at Mapleton, Bourbon Co., Kansas. Yours in belief of the truth.

P. S. As to pay or remuneration for the services of a Minister, his chance in this is just as good as in any other country.

REMARKS BY THE EDITOR.—We wish our neighbors who claim to be "orthodox" on the soul and its destiny, would cease to be unjust to Wm. Miller (who is asleep) and to Josiah Litch, who is now Editor of the Advent Herald, Boston, Mass. Neither of those Ministers ever agreed with us on the state of the dead or the end of the wicked. We have always cleared them of any sympathy with us on those points. Josiah Litch is as "orthodox" on those points as the most "orthodox" Minister in Kansas; and it is wicked to attribute to him views with which he has no sympathy; and we beg the Kansas Minister to cease such wicked insinuations. If we are doing mischief, as the Kansas Preacher thinks, let us bear the blame, and not cast it on Wm. Miller and Josiah Litch. Let them bear their own sins, if they have any; but it is no part of their sins that they have believed in the non-immortality of man. Our Kansas Reproacher, should remember that it is the part of the "Man of Sin" to teach, that "The end justifies the means;" and therefore he should not couple Wm. Miller and Josiah Litch with Geo. Storrs on the immortality question. There is not, and never was, that we know of, any unity between us on that question.

As to our views making "infidels and deists," we are confident there is no truth in that assertion. It is the doctrine of immortal souls and eternal torments that has driven thinking men into infidelity. Such men were made to believe the Bible taught the endless torture of unnumbered beings that God had created immortal. Such a doctrine shocked reason, God's great Sentry against false theories of all sorts; and hence, men who dared to call in question the "orthodox" notion of immortal souls in eternal torture, have been denounced as infidels.

We wish to call the mind off from the traditions of men to the Bible itself; and we affirm, there is no doctrine therein that shocks reason when examined in the light of the known perfections of God, and construed by the general tenor of that blessed volume. Our controversy with deists, in their "Convention" in Hartford, Conn., in 1853, demonstrated the power of the Bible against deism; while the "orthodoxy" of the age was only as so much "rotten wood" in their path. Orthodoxy itself gave us credit of being more than a match for the deists in that Convention. How did we succeed in the work? By demolishing the food supplied by the anti-christian and inhuman notions of immortal souls and endless torments; showing that the Bible taught no such doctrines; and that the God of the bible was as good as the God of Nature. In no other way can infidelity and deism be defeated. In this light many infidels have been turned to the Lord.

From Eld. J. Lewis.

OTTO, ILLS., July 17, 1865.

DEAR BRN. AND SISTERS IN CHRIST OUR LIFE-GIVER:—I have thought that a few lines from the old one armed preacher might be interesting to some if not to all. Well, we have got the tent with an additional expense in consequence of its being sent to Wheaton, nearly 200 miles North of Lewistown, which in all amounts to $11, 95. But we feel to render hearty thanks to the Brethren for their liberality in giving us the "Greenbacks" to pay the expense. May the Lord reward them with eternal life in the kingdom.

Our Grove meeting came off triumphant. Br. Campbell is a workman; and as Br. Mc Cullough remarked, Br. Lewis has sown seed here that cannot be rooted out; so we say, Br. Campbell has done up the work here on the glorious and altogether absorbing truth, life only through Christ. But notwithstanding, Br. Mc Cullough's frank admission, in his winding up discourse, at our previous meeting, at the above named place, he made a strong effort to uproot the tree of no resurrection to the wicked, and to plant in its stead the old rotten tree of a general resurrection of all the old world who were judged, executed and destroyed by water, the Sodomites and all that have died or may die from Adam to the coming of Christ, and all at the same time, good and bad; thus ignoring the thousand years' theory. But still, and strange to tell, after firing his big gun, as he, and a few others that seldom ever read their Bibles called it, he runs off boasting of what he had done; just as though he and nobody else had ever done any thing.

Now, we want no honor that comes from men; neither do we wish to be found ranked with boasters. What we have done has been with an eye single to the glory of God, and we mean to continue by the help of our heavenly Father to sow the seed; and that too, where no one else has sown hoping to reap in due season, if we faint not. It is true that our labor in this vast field is hard, being mostly on foot for the want of means to travel otherwise.

Our next appointment is twelve miles North of Lewistown; and then we expect to start on our tour South, until we arrive at Lebanon, Ill. We shall be under the necessity (if not of choice) of stopping often on our way, whereas, if we had funds we could determine when we could meet with our beloved brethren at Hornby, and in other places. But as it is, we can only say that they may expect us, if the Lord will. If any of the Brethren feel it a duty, as well as a privilege, to help us on our way, they can do so by sending to Ashland, Cass Co., Ills., any time between this and the first of August. We would say, that if we should not get the letters in that time, we shall instruct the Post Master to send them to us.

Br. Campbell is with us, and he is just the man, and ought to be sustained in this Western field; and we feel that the friends of the cause and lovers of truth will see to it, so that his family will be comfortably provided for. Yours in hope of eternal life.

My P. O. Address, till further notice, will be HORNSBY, Macoupin Co., Ills. Those who owe me money, which I have advanced for them, some time since, will do me the justice to remit the amount, as I am in want of it. I hope they will heed this call.

SIX SERMONS on the inquiry, Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the Life-giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by GEO. STORRS; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This word contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in plain binding, 50 cents; in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near ten years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER: OR, MAN IN DEATH; AND THE HOPE FOR A FUTURE LIFE.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead, can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none there fore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD; OR, THE RIGHTEOUS ONLY WILL LIVE AGAIN. By GEO. STORRS. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the EDITOR of the HERALD OF LIFE. Price, $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.—IMMORTALITY: The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev, T. M. POST, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by GEO. STORRS. Price in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. POST, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a Prize Essay on IMMORTALITY, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men, with ut egard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. POST took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The REVIEWER followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The Author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

BIBLE VS. TRADITION: in which the True Teaching of the Bible is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity Life, Death, &c. Price, bound, $1. Postage 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. It is a work of much labor and research. The title indicates its object, and the performance shows the object was kept in view throughout. The language is sometimes severe on what is called "orthodoxy—more so than is desirable—but the value of the work, in general, cannot be over-estimated. Thousands of it have been sent abroad, and thousand more ought to be scattered. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subjects; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

how much less do "evening morning"! Let us collate two passages relating to the Mosaic sacrifices, that the force of "evening morning" may be felt. "This is the offering of Aaron and of his sons, which they shall offer unto the Lord in the day when he is anointed; the tenth part of an ephah of fine flour for a meat offering perpetual, half it in the morning, and half thereof at night"—or "evening." Lev. vi. 20. "And Zadok the priest, and his brethren the priests, before the tabernacle of the Lord in the high place that was at Gibeon, to offer burnt offerings unto the Lord upon the altar of the burnt offering continually, morning and evening." 1 Chron. xvi. 40. Now we maintain that "evening morning" in the text must be just as literal as the same phrase in the two quoted passages, for in both cases the relation is the same. The question and answer are firmly connected. In the vision, Daniel sees the little horn take away the daily sacrifice. Then occurs the question,—"How long the vision concerning the daily sacrifice?" That is, How long shall the little horn tread under foot the daily sacrifice? How long from the discontinuance of the daily sacrifice? Then comes the answer—Two thousand three hundred evening morning sacrifices shall be prevented by the dominance of the little horn. It is an utter impossibility to get any other meaning from it.

Still another argument is suggested by verse 17. "And it came to pass, when I, even I Daniel, had seen the vision, and sought for the meaning, then, behold, there stood before me as the appearance of a man. And I heard a man's voice between the banks of Ulai, which called, and said,—Gabriel, make this man to understand the vision. So he came near where I stood; and when he came, I was afraid, and fell upon my face: but he said unto me, Understand, O son of man; for at the time of the end shall be the vision." This is "the vision concerning the daily sacrifice, "for it would not do to say that the whole vision is referred to: else Media and Persia and Grecia as spoken of in the end of the chapter would have to come up in the future. It is clear that the "2300 evening morning" belongs to "the time of the end." Year-day theorists say that the time of the end began in A. D. 1792; if so, the 2300 years must begin at that date: whereas, taking the literal time, there is no difficulty.

Yet another argument arises in verse 26. "The vision of the evening and morning which was told is true: wherefore shut thou up the vision; for it shall be for many days." That is, the taking away of the daily sacrifice for 2300 evening morning is true, but shut thou up the vision, for many days will elapse before the period of its fulfilment will arrive; at the time of the end shall be the vision.

Thus before the simplicity of the truth the year-day system of interpretation melts away as snow before the vernal sun. So may all error speedily dissolve, O YAHVEH! J. T. C.

Our Strange Friend Again.

NEW YORK, July 22, 1865.

TO THE ED. OF HER. OF LIFE, SIR:—By your favor I am in possession of your last number, in which I perceive that you inserted my note and made remarks, which on the whole are courteous; but justice demands some explanation. The debate to which I alluded, was not as you suppose, and as I thought, between two individuals, but between whosoever jumps up first to defend or assail spiritualism; hence your people did not intrude where they were not invited; but they intruded their opinions where not called for. The spiritualists contended that the word of God is a mere nothing to their inspirations and revelations. The reply to this need not call forth the question whether the souls of the wicked will suffer or live.

As to myself, though I shrink not from defending what I believe to be vital truth, yet I would not engage in a discussion at present. You will observe I said, "I should much like to HEAR one well conducted discussion." There are two reasons why I would not debate myself. 1st, I am not acquainted, except by hearsay, with what your opinions really are 2d, I do not believe them to be such heresy as to deserve any thing more than kind, Christian, quiet argument as to what saith the Lord; and though I believe you err in regard to the punishment of the wicked, yet as you believe in God manifest in the flesh, who suffered, died, and rose again that we may be saved, this glorious faith entitles you to be considered as a child of God. The last words of your "remarks," on my note, show that you are so wedded to your opinions as to hold every one of them of such mighty importance as to consider those to be "opponents to the bible testimony" who think differently from you. This is to be regretted; but then it calls forth the virtue of forbearance, and this for Christ's sake shall be extended to all who love his name, by PHILALETHUS.

REMARKS BY THE EDITOR.—Our strange friend now concedes that the persons holding our views did not intrude by speaking in the discussion a week ago last Sunday; "but they intruded their opinions when not called for." That, our friend must admit, is a mere matter of opinion. And as the Chairman did not decide them out of order, we cannot say they were so. We differ from "PHILALETHUS" as to the manner of meeting Spiritualists. Demonstrate that "the dead know not anything," and that "there is no knowledge in sheol," and Spiritualism is proved to be mere conjuration or the work of the devil.

We reciprocate our friend's "forbearance;" but unfortunately he sees occasion for it where we discover none. We think we expressed no such sentiment as he attributes to us, when he says "you consider those to be opponents to the Bible testimony who think differently form you." If he will read our remarks again, he will see that all we said was, if a "debate" is to be had, we should "hold an opponent to the Bible testimony;" by which we simply intended, we should not allow one who should debate with us to wander from the Bible into "vain philosophy," as most do who oppose our views, in their endeavors to overthrow our arguments.

Tradition and Ancient Chronology.

It was the condemnation of the Jewish Pharisees and Scribes that they departed from the word of God and followed traditions of the Elders, making the word of God, the Scriptures, of none effect by their traditions.

As it was with the Scribes and Pharisees in the time of our Lord's first advent, so it seems to be in these days, and probably so it will continue to be until his second advent.

In regard to the opinion which so entirely prevails, that this dispensation will end when the "world that now is" shall be just 6000 years old. Is this a tradition of the Elders or fathers? or is it scripture? if it is scripture, where is the authority? or where the passages which warrant such a belief? If it is not scripture, but a tradition of the Jews, handed down to us through Dr. Adam Clarke and others before him, how much is it worth? Is a Jewish tradition, or a tradition handed down from the Fathers of this dispensation worth any more to us than the traditions of the Elders were worth to the Scribes and Pharisees?

By Fathers here, I do not mean inspired men who wrote the book of Acts and the Epistles, they were Apostles; but I mean those who succeeded them, and they may have been their immediate successors or even contemporary with the apostles, even as far back as Barnabas who I have heard quoted as authority, but when we go back as far as Barnabas, why not step, as it were, just across the street and consult the apostles, whose authority is unquestioned.

This going back only to the fathers to prove a favorite theory, whether it be a pre or a post millenium, or the 6000 years, or anything else, if it reaches back no farther than that, what is it worth? Is it really of any more value to us than the traditions of the Elders were to the Scribes and Pharisees? and if of no more value, why build a theory upon tradition which cannot be sustained by scripture?

Now it may be that this idea of the 6000 years has a scriptural basis; if so, I would be glad to see it produced, but, if it is not scripture, it should be worth to us just as much as any other tradition, and no more. Consequently a time argument based upon the 6000 year idea is of no more value than any other theory which has only tradition for a basis.

That the early chronology of the Hebrew copies, from which our version of the Scriptures is translated is materially defective there are good reasons to believe is the case, and the evidence is of too grave a character to be lightly esteemed or set aside without a candid examination. If it can be proved that there is a defect in the chronology of our version of several hundred years, it is manifest that any time argument based upon such defective chronology must mislead and prove to be erroneous, and consequently sadly injurious to the cause of truth. I therefore propose to transcribe the argument, accompanied with Chronologcal tables, of an author, who has given this subject great research, and is entitled to our candid consideration presenting the subject chiefly in his own language, condensing only as much as will suffice to present fairly his chain of evidence, let it be candidly and critically examined by the readers and let the argument stand or fall on its own merits, truth being our only object and aim. To b'rth of Abr'm	292	942	1072	993

Referring to table No 1, and Gen. v. 2–26, vii. 11, the reader will at once perceive, that, according to the authorized English translation, and the Hebrew text from which it was made, 1656 years elapsed from the creation to the flood; that the Septuagint estimate of this period is greatly extended. From Adam to Mahalaleel, five successive generations, this version makes each Patriarch one hundred years older than the Hebrew. In the case of Enoch, the Septuagint has one hundred years, and in the case of Lamech six years more than the Hebrew; the Septuagint on the whole period, giving us four hundred and six years more than the Hebrew.

In the second table, which illustrates the period after the flood we are first struck by the appearance of Cainan in the Septuagint table, what is not found in either the Hebrew or the Samaritan, and which gives an addition to the period of 130 years. Here we find six successive Patriarchs according to the Hebrew, to whose ages prior to the birth of their eldest sons respectively the Samaritan and the Septuagint agree in adding 100 years each, and to Nahor these two Versions add 50 years.

From this date it appears, that in the postdiluvian period the Hebrew gives us but 292 years, while the Samaritan has nine hundred and forty-two, and the Septuagint one thousand and seventy-two years. Showing a difference from the creation to the birth of Abraham, in the Septuagint more than the Hebrew 1386 years. Then chronological differences are so great, that no historical scheme applicable to one, can be accommodated to the other. They are sufficient to derange the entire scope and connection of the historical record which refer to these times.

To explain this to those who have not studied the subject, it will be necessary to observe, that, for some time before the introduction of Christianity, the professors of the Mosaic religion had been divided into three distinct and independant communities. Each of these had a temple as the centre of their worship: a recognized copy of the Holy Scriptures in their own language: and each regarded the other two with feelings of the most raucorous jealousy. These were:

1. The Hebrew Jews, who worshipped at Jerusalem, and who are generally supposed to have used the square characters of the present Hebrew Bible.

2. The Samaritans, whose temple was situated on Mount Gerizim, who used a Syriac dialect with Phœnecian characters; these received no part of holy writ except the five books of Moses.

3. The Hellenistic Jews of Egypt, whose usual language and characters were Greek. They had their temple at Heliopolis.

The opinions now generally received among critics, respecting the existing HEBREW text, is, that it was written in its present character, which is Chaldean about the time of Ezra, and it is inferred that Ezra, when he reformed the Jewish church, transcribed the ancient characters of the Hebrews into the square letters of the Chaldeans: for the use of those Jews, who, being born during the captivity, knew no other alphabet than that of the people among whom they had been educated. Consequently, the old character, which we call Samaritan, fell into total disuse. Confirmation of this point is to be found in the ancient Hebrew coins, which were struck before the captivity, the characters engraven on all of them are the same as the modern Samaritan. See Horne's introduction. Vol. 1, page 190, Am. Ed.

The text thus produced, remained without material alteration until about the time of Christ; when, in consequence of the prevalence of the Greek language, the Hebrew scriptures were almost entirely neglected.

The SEPTUAGINT, or first Greek version of the Scriptures was made at Alexandria, in Egypt. It was made from the original Hebrew about B. C. 280; it was recognized as a correct version by the highest Jewish authorities, and by their sanction introduced into the Synagogue, and it remained thus unchallenged for nearly four hundred years as a faithful translation of the original scriptures. It is a translation of the Hebrew scriptures as they were held by the Jews who lived under the second temple, and who, at that time, were the trustees to whom were committed the oracles of God.

It is more than this: not only was its original the book of scripture as held by the then existing church of God, but the translation also received the unqualified approbation of the church. The high priest and the Sanhedrim approved the Septuagint, and authorized its use in all the synagogues where the Greek language was spoken.—Dr. H. Owen's Inquiry, page 6.

Philo Judaeus, who lived in the the age of the apostles, asserts "that the Hebrews who knew the Greek language, and the Greeks who understood the Hebrew were so struck with admiration at the entire agreement between the original and the translation, that they not only adored them as sisters, but as one and the same, both in word and things; styling the translators not only accurate scholars, but inspired interpreters and prophets, who, with a singular purity of spirit, had entered into the very sentiments of Moses." Let it be remembered that Philo was an eminent literary writer on Sacred history he must, therefore, have been well acquainted with the Hebrew scriptures, and with the Septuagint version. Can we, then, in such circumstances imagine that, either when the translation was made, or in the days of Philo, (in the apostolic age) the Hebrew and Greek numbers differed by one thousand three hundred and eighty-six years? Is it possible that either the Sanhedrim or the historian could have overlooked so important a discrepancy? This improbability amounts almost to an impossibility, when we consider that the Septuagint was not confined to the closets of the learned, but was generally known throughout the length and breadth of Judea, and was publicly read in the synagogues. The Septuagint was the version from which our Saviour quoted, being the only one in common use among the people at large, the Hebrew being confined to the learned. Thus it received his sanction and of the apostles also after his ascension. But there is other evidence which not only goes to prove, that, down to the beginning of the first century, the Hebrew and Septuagint chronologies were identical, but also shows that the numbers then received were the same as are now found in the Septuagint.

WORKING CHRISTIANS.—Learn to be workngi Christians. "Be ye doers of the word, and not hearers only, deceiving your own selves." It is very striking to see the usefulness of many Christians. Are there none of you who know what it is to be selfish in your Christianity? You have seen a selfish child go into a secret place to enjoy some delicious morsel undisturbed by his companions. So it is with some Christians. They feed upon Christ and forgivingness; but it is alone, and all for themselves.

Are there not some of you who can enjoy being a Christian, while your dearest friend is not, and yet you will not speak to him? See here you have got work to do. When Christ found you He said, "Go, work in my vineyard." What were you hired for, if not to spread salvation? What blessed for? O, my Christian friends! how little you live as though you were the servants of Christ! How much idle time and idle talk you have! This is not like a good servant. How many things you have to do for yourself! how few for Christ and his people! This is not like a servant.—McCheyne.

From Samuel J. Brimhall.

MAPLETON, KANSAS, July 9, 1865.

BR. STORRS:—We are in great need of a Minister in this portion of Kansas. We need a watchman clad with the christian panoply and armed with a whole gospel; able to give it to the people clothed with the spirit and with power. The truth is suffering for want of such a man, and the community in this vicinity and its surroundings are suffering far worse for the need of it. There are four denominations represented in this place (viz) Episcopal, Protestant Methodist, Presbyterian, and Campbellites; and the people listen to the preacher of one denomination one sabbath and another the next, the month round, and then commence again; and with all this spiritual food the people are starving to death; some are dead already, and others twice dead and plucked up by the roots.

My nearest neighbor is an Episcopal Methodist Minister, a good bible historian, and is tenacious for the truth and his way of it. He told me to day that he would sacrifice his life rather than have the doctrine of the immortality of the soul go down; because that, said he, is the foundation of all our doctrine. Another, a Protestant Methodist Minister, whom I invited home with me last Sabbath, stated that this doctrine of soul sleeping unconsciousness in death, and kindred doctrines, got up by Storrs, Miller, Litch, and others, was making more infidels and deists than Paine's "Age of Reason." He said he had read Josiah Litch's works, had them now, and kept them to refer too as a theological curiosity. The mass of the people are fully apprized of the fallacy of the present style of preaching, and the result of it is plain to be seen.

I am confident that the truth would be listened to with the best attention and by good congregations. The doctrine of no future life to the wicked would be entirely new in this place. I had hoped Eld. Thos. W. Smith would have got out here this summer; but I fear he will fail to reach us, and we do want some one to come. If we can't get one of the best preachers we will be thankful for one not so good. Yet we do not want the cause injured nor the way of truth evil spoken of.

If this call should reach any Ministering brother that will come, and wishes to know concerning this country, he may address me at Mapleton, Bourbon Co., Kansas. Yours in belief of the truth.

P. S. As to pay or remuneration for the services of a Minister, his chance in this is just as good as in any other country.

REMARKS BY THE EDITOR.—We wish our neighbors who claim to be "orthodox" on the soul and its destiny, would cease to be unjust to Wm. Miller (who is asleep) and to Josiah Litch, who is now Editor of the Advent Herald, Boston, Mass. Neither of those Ministers ever agreed with us on the state of the dead or the end of the wicked. We have always cleared them of any sympathy with us on those points. Josiah Litch is as "orthodox" on those points as the most "orthodox" Minister in Kansas; and it is wicked to attribute to him views with which he has no sympathy; and we beg the Kansas Minister to cease such wicked insinuations. If we are doing mischief, as the Kansas Preacher thinks, let us bear the blame, and not cast it on Wm. Miller and Josiah Litch. Let them bear their own sins, if they have any; but it is no part of their sins that they have believed in the non-immortality of man. Our Kansas Reproacher, should remember that it is the part of the "Man of Sin" to teach, that "The end justifies the means;" and therefore he should not couple Wm. Miller and Josiah Litch with Geo. Storrs on the immortality question. There is not, and never was, that we know of, any unity between us on that question.

As to our views making "infidels and deists," we are confident there is no truth in that assertion. It is the doctrine of immortal souls and eternal torments that has driven thinking men into infidelity. Such men were made to believe the Bible taught the endless torture of unnumbered beings that God had created immortal. Such a doctrine shocked reason, God's great Sentry against false theories of all sorts; and hence, men who dared to call in question the "orthodox" notion of immortal souls in eternal torture, have been denounced as infidels.

We wish to call the mind off from the traditions of men to the Bible itself; and we affirm, there is no doctrine therein that shocks reason when examined in the light of the known perfections of God, and construed by the general tenor of that blessed volume. Our controversy with deists, in their "Convention" in Hartford, Conn., in 1853, demonstrated the power of the Bible against deism; while the "orthodoxy" of the age was only as so much "rotten wood" in their path. Orthodoxy itself gave us credit of being more than a match for the deists in that Convention. How did we succeed in the work? By demolishing the food supplied by the anti-christian and inhuman notions of immortal souls and endless torments; showing that the Bible taught no such doctrines; and that the God of the bible was as good as the God of Nature. In no other way can infidelity and deism be defeated. In this light many infidels have been turned to the Lord.

From Eld. J. Lewis.

OTTO, ILLS., July 17, 1865.

DEAR BRN. AND SISTERS IN CHRIST OUR LIFE-GIVER:—I have thought that a few lines from the old one armed preacher might be interesting to some if not to all. Well, we have got the tent with an additional expense in consequence of its being sent to Wheaton, nearly 200 miles North of Lewistown, which in all amounts to $11, 95. But we feel to render hearty thanks to the Brethren for their liberality in giving us the "Greenbacks" to pay the expense. May the Lord reward them with eternal life in the kingdom.

Our Grove meeting came off triumphant. Br. Campbell is a workman; and as Br. Mc Cullough remarked, Br. Lewis has sown seed here that cannot be rooted out; so we say, Br. Campbell has done up the work here on the glorious and altogether absorbing truth, life only through Christ. But notwithstanding, Br. Mc Cullough's frank admission, in his winding up discourse, at our previous meeting, at the above named place, he made a strong effort to uproot the tree of no resurrection to the wicked, and to plant in its stead the old rotten tree of a general resurrection of all the old world who were judged, executed and destroyed by water, the Sodomites and all that have died or may die from Adam to the coming of Christ, and all at the same time, good and bad; thus ignoring the thousand years' theory. But still, and strange to tell, after firing his big gun, as he, and a few others that seldom ever read their Bibles called it, he runs off boasting of what he had done; just as though he and nobody else had ever done any thing.

Now, we want no honor that comes from men; neither do we wish to be found ranked with boasters. What we have done has been with an eye single to the glory of God, and we mean to continue by the help of our heavenly Father to sow the seed; and that too, where no one else has sown hoping to reap in due season, if we faint not. It is true that our labor in this vast field is hard, being mostly on foot for the want of means to travel otherwise.

Our next appointment is twelve miles North of Lewistown; and then we expect to start on our tour South, until we arrive at Lebanon, Ill. We shall be under the necessity (if not of choice) of stopping often on our way, whereas, if we had funds we could determine when we could meet with our beloved brethren at Hornby, and in other places. But as it is, we can only say that they may expect us, if the Lord will. If any of the Brethren feel it a duty, as well as a privilege, to help us on our way, they can do so by sending to Ashland, Cass Co., Ills., any time between this and the first of August. We would say, that if we should not get the letters in that time, we shall instruct the Post Master to send them to us.

Br. Campbell is with us, and he is just the man, and ought to be sustained in this Western field; and we feel that the friends of the cause and lovers of truth will see to it, so that his family will be comfortably provided for. Yours in hope of eternal life.

My P. O. Address, till further notice, will be HORNSBY, Macoupin Co., Ills. Those who owe me money, which I have advanced for them, some time since, will do me the justice to remit the amount, as I am in want of it. I hope they will heed this call.

Books and Pamphlets

FOR SALE AT THIS OFFICE.

On all books and pamphlets sent by mail the postage has to be pre-paid.

SIX SERMONS on the inquiry, Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the Life-giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by GEO. STORRS; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This word contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in plain binding, 50 cents; in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near ten years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER: OR, MAN IN DEATH; AND THE HOPE FOR A FUTURE LIFE.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead, can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none there fore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD; OR, THE RIGHTEOUS ONLY WILL LIVE AGAIN. By GEO. STORRS. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the EDITOR of the HERALD OF LIFE. Price, $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.—IMMORTALITY: The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev, T. M. POST, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by GEO. STORRS. Price in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. POST, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a Prize Essay on IMMORTALITY, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men, with ut egard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. POST took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The REVIEWER followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The Author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

BIBLE VS. TRADITION: in which the True Teaching of the Bible is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity Life, Death, &c. Price, bound, $1. Postage 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. It is a work of much labor and research. The title indicates its object, and the performance shows the object was kept in view throughout. The language is sometimes severe on what is called "orthodoxy —more so than is desirable—but the value of the work, in general, cannot be over-estimated. Thousands of it have been sent abroad, and thousand more ought to be scattered. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subjects; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

Children's Department.

LETTERS TO CHILDREN.—NO. 1.

DEAR CHILDREN of the Herald of Life:—Let me introduce myself to you as Uncle Lafe; for although not an old man, yet I am uncle to a great many children; some of them larger than myself. I wish to tell you first of all that I love children very much, and delight in teaching them those things that will be useful to them in this life, and enable them to gain that life which is to come.

But perhaps some little boys and and girls who read this will say, O, if you are going to talk about religion, we don't want to hear you, for it is such dull stuff. To such I would say, listen to me while I tell you some of my experience. When a little boy, I thought religion of all things the dullest. I could not enjoy the society of religious people at all; and I used to think that heaven was a very dull place where none but sour faced and austere people lived, and where no children's plays ever intruded. But when about fifteen years old, I went to live with my youngest sister's husband, who had read our beloved Editor's writings, and he told me a very different story about heaven. From him I learned that heaven, instead of being some far off place that we know nothing about, and cannot comprehend, will be here on this earth, which will be made new and beautiful. There will be hills and valleys, brooks and rivers, trees of most beautiful foliage and lovely flowers, and delicious fruit. Instead of the people being phantoms, or ghosts, they will be literal and tangible beings, just as we are now, only they will never die nor grow old. And instead of the people being morose and austere, all will be love and joy; yes, pleasures greater than we can possibly conceive of, will be enjoyed there. Jesus will be King, then, over all the earth; and he will love his people, and permit them to approach him and receive his blessing.

If you will read the bible, it will tell you all I have written and a great deal more. Two verses I will quote,—"Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth." Matth. v. 5. "Then the sun shall be confounded, and the moon ashamed, when the Lord of hosts shall reign in Mount Zion, and in Jerusalem, and before his ancients gloriously." Isa. xxiv. 25.

Now dear children, don't you want to be among the happy number that shall see the "King in his beauty," and walk the broad streets of the New Jerusalem, and live on the earth made new, where all will be beautiful and lovely? If you do, then come to the Saviour now. Be sorry for your sins and try to do right; and in your little prayers ask God to forgive you, and enable you to do as he has commanded in his holy word. O, I do hope I shall meet you all on that glad day, when Jesus comes to make up his jewels.

Iowa. UNCLE LAFE.

"THOU SHALT NOT STEAL."

There once lived a young boy whose name was Billy Jones. But he was not like you, dear children, who can understand what you read, and what you hear. No, poor Billy was foolish. He would, when spoken to, either stare, or laugh in a silly manner, which was very sad to see.

He had a father, a mother, and one sister older than himself. His parents were poor, and had to depend mainly on their daughter Mary, who was at service with a rich lady.

Mr. and Mrs. Graham lived in a fine place called the Grange. They were charitable to the needy, especially to the Jones family, and Billy was allowed to come in at any time to their house, the servants having been told to let him amuse himself around.

But though poor Billy was so ignorant, he would remember most of what he heard about God, about heaven, and about our Lord Jesus Christ; and whenever his mother spoke to him of those things, his face would brighten up with pleasure.

Of all the portions of the Bible which Billy had had explained to him, the Ten Commandments had impressed him the most, and he would be heard again and again repeating to himself the words of the eighth, "Thou shalt not steal."

One day he had been sent to the Grange with a message to his sister. As he passed under the kitchen window he saw in the grass something shining, and picked it up. It was a beautiful silver spoon, such as poor Billy never handled before. He knew little, but enough to see how much richer would his hard-working father be made by this; but this poor lad had in his heart the fear of God, that fear which keeps us from sin.

He put the spoon in his coat-sleeve, for his pocket was not deep enough to hide it entirely, and walked in. After having given his message, he added that he must see the lady. They all were surprised, for he always had seemed afraid of their master and mistress. His look too was so strange, that the good-natured servants gathered around him; but to all their inquiries as to what ailed him, he answered by repeating his request, and as soon as unobserved, he made his way to the parlor, where there was company.

The sight of so many strangers made his poor heart beat fast; but on he went, intent upon returning to its owners what he had found. At last Mrs. Graham saw him, when she exclaimed in astonishment, though kindly, "Well, my boy, what do you want to-day?"

Billy then approached her, and pulling the spoon out of his coat-sleeve, put it in her hands, repeating slowly, "Thou shalt not steal—thou shalt not steal."

You may imagine the surprise, not of the lady only, but of all present. Soon every one in the room had surrounded the lad, who kept saying to himself, "Thou shalt not steal."

Mr. Graham then, kindly taking the child by the hand, asked how he got the spoon. After some time he could pronounce as much as, "Under the kitchen window—Billy found—'thou shalt not steal.'"

All were much moved at this proof of God's fear in the heart of one so young; and Mr. Graham, taking him to the hall where the servants were at their meal, told them what an example of honesty and of regard for the law of God he had just given them; and as soon as he was disengaged, Mr. Graham brought back Billy to his mother.

The good woman was filled with gratitude at finding that the instruction given to her child had not been in vain; and great was her joy when their kind friend promised to place Billy, as a reward for his conduct, in an institution where he would be taken the best care of, and instructed in such a manner that he might regain some clearness of mind.

God had put His blessing on the faithfulness of an idiot boy; and He will certainly, dear children, do the same to you, if you try to love Him with all your heart.

THE USE OF SALT.

"BENJAMIN RIDGE, M. D., F. R. C. S., &c.," published a work in "London, 1858," entitled "Health and Disease: Their Laws, with Plain Practical Prescriptions for the People." DR. RIDGE, it seems, has issued other important works. The work above named is a very learned Medical book of over 600 pages.

As the subject of salt eating has casually been introduced into our columns we have concluded to give the Doctor's remarks on the use of salt. It is a curious production; but as to its value we express no opinion. He is speaking on "Diet as influencing the character of nations and individuals—freedom and the use of salt." He says:

Taking wheaten bread as the basis of a class of diet which characterises the highest type of civilisation, I can aver, without fear of contradiction, that no nation uses it to the extent we do in England,—all other high class diets following, as a matter of course, in like proportion; all of which exercises an influence accordingly on the physical and mental capacities of the Anglo-Saxons, the possession of which has never been doubted, as respects either practical science, commerce, or prowess on the battle-field.

Secondly, as to the love of freedom inherent to the Anglo-Saxon, and his free use of salt;—these, no doubt, seem strange subjects to be commingled and connected; for what can an Anglo Saxon's birthright have to do with a mere necessary of life? The national spirit is expressive of liberty, independence of action, mind, and character; intellectual and moral enfranchisement; exemption from vassalage, serfdom, priestcraft, concordats, conscriptions, or passports—including also freedom to speak or think without permission of its rulers. On the other hand, no matter what the country or climate, wherever any check or drawback on any of these great mental attributes exists, the mind, the thoughts, the ideas, the very springs and emanations of the brain, become warped and morbid; and no nation can rise above a certain level, or beyond a certain greatness, whose powers are contracted, and whose tendencies are constantly to "make mad the guilty and appal the free." In all these latter conditions, nations and people seem made for rulers, and not rulers for their free government.

What, then, has salt to do with this? What part does that play? Why, the very same in our material composition individually, as, comparatively speaking, our free institutions do for the elevation and dignity of the national character. Shakspeare, "Nature's sweetest child," must have had some idea of this, when he wrote:—"Is not discourse, manhood, learning, gentleness, virtue, and liberality, the spice and salt that seasons a man?" Are not, I add, the very anxieties, troubles, mental efforts, commerce, ambition, glory, renown,—in fact all inducements to worldly advancement, so much salt to the mind?

Now, the very bases of all our substances and secretions are salts. When speaking on the laws of health and disease, I stated the fact of acids and alkalis having their governing proportions in the system; and I may now observe, that their bases are unions in due proportions of a salt,—no matter which may predominate, whether the acid or the alkali,—which cause either an action or a re-action on the system, the one setting the other free. Now I need scarcely say, that there is nothing so wholesome or so necessary for the human frame and animal juices, as salt taken in reasonable proportions with fresh meats and vegetables; whereas, on the other hand, "Salt too little which may season give," begets a lack of all the nobler elements of a healthy, moral, and physical existence.

"The consequence of a lack of salt, in fact, is, that the human frame and physique become vitiated and degraded to a state resembling that of the carnivorous animals;—whence they acquire dispositions of revenge, treacherousness, and remorseless cruelty, strangely contrasted with the arrant cowardice, which they display when not under the excitement of their tempers. In fact, if the use of salt be limited, the material and mental powers will be limited in like proportion; while, on the other hand, if the supply of salt be increased, the bodily and intellectual faculties will be proportionately improved. Indeed, strange as the doctrine may appear to some, I cannot avoid the expression of my belief, that the vast strides made in the development of the mental capacities and varied resources of the Anglo-Saxon, as exhibited in the vast improvements this race has made in the arts and sciences during the last half-century, have been in a great measure due to the removal of the formerly most oppressive duty on salt.

In no country whatever of the world has the universality of increase and advance in every class of the community met with any equal to this. In every country where the limitation of the use of salt exists, owing to the absurd duties imposed upon it by a misguided and money-grasping government, no upward movement of the masses or lower orders takes place. The greatest places are filled with those who can afford to use it, and they alone rise who can thus afford to take the most; for they only are fitted for such duties. So much do mighty ends depend on small causes, so much do the greatest powers revolve on the smallest pivots.

Again, there is nothing more poisonous or unwholesome to the blood, when long continued or used in excessive quantities, as salt; nor can I too strongly impress this fact on our own Government authorities, whom I would earnestly entreat, in these days of rapid steam communication, to do away, as far as possible, with the demoralising, unwholsome, and cruel system of supplying salt meat to our army and navy. . . . .

There is another Board, too, that deserves strong reprobation on account of its most cruel and pernicious doings;—I mean that of the East India Company, whose continued exactions of a duty on salt in India is one of those things that bring a curse upon their heads, a curse upon their management, a curse upon the native population that they rule. For want of salt thousands die every year. In cursing one another they use this term: "May you get no salt." They are not flesh-eaters, so much as of fruit and rice,—the long-continued use of which, with an inconsiderable proportion of salt, and often none at all, breeds, in some, debility, marasmus, and cholera,—in all, a want of high noble feeling; inasmuch as their blood, unsavored with salt, begets in them the degraded passions and instincts of the carnivora. In short, the very salt with which they are provided, at a cruelly extravagant price, owing to John Company's monopoly, is so bad, as to be little more than a dark saline earth, so sparingly charged with muriate of soda as to require to be taken in large quantities to do any good.

How absurd, then, is it to say, while condemning these cruel, infatuated, and ignorant people, that they have not been "true to their salt;" when, in fact, they have never really had that to which they can be true, or for the welfare of their physical and the advancement of their mental health. Neither Providence nor science are heeded by this, I hope not wilfully, ignorant board, who regard a revenue as the one and only thing needful. That they know the extent of injury they do, or the lives lost every year through their misguided policy, I cannot for one moment believe; and what makes the matter far worse, India is the only dependency of the Crown of England in which this most iniquitous tax is levied. Of all the countries in the world, too, to levy it in a rice or grain-eating community, where salt constitutes an absolute indispensable to the health of the people, is to me one of the most extraordinary cruelties and absurdities of legislation that can possibly be imagined in a so-called philanthropic and scientific age like the present.

The sea holds its salt in solution, and its coasts can furnish any amount. It is difficult to get it in cold countries, where there is a want of evaporation by heat; but there is no excuse in India. Moreover, as I have observed before, divine Providence, in its care for the wants of animal life, has willed that thousands of miles up the country there should be salt rocks and mountains.

What avails the wisdom of Providence to native populations starving and perishing for this necessary of life, so distinctly provided for them, which they might gather and use as freely as the air they breathe in their almost barren wilderness? Why should this most necessary element of life be withheld from them by their fellow-men? Why have we, in these plains and deserts, rocks of salt distributed everywhere, and to which animals migrate from distant parts to lick, and then return, when satiated, to their native prairies? Is man, I would ask, of less consideration than the beasts of the forest or field? No!—man should not be in any way restricted in his use of salt; and it should always be the purest that he can get, and taken with all fresh meats and vegetables;—because, thus taken, it is a general purifier and nourisher of his body and blood, influencing also, most beneficially, his every mental faculty. Indeed, his condition without it becomes in every way vitiated.

Providence, be assured, has given this element in most bountiful proportions, corresponding with the requirements of animal life; and what shall we say of him, who would deny salt to his fellow-man, or give it so sparingly, that it should almost amount to a complete withholding thereof? Let such a one be accursed!

Let it be left for foreign kings and emperors to check the free and healthy currents in their subjects' blood;—to be always haunted with treasons, and, if they will, live and reign in doubt of their subjects' fidelity to their thrones and persons, the continuance of their own reign and dynasties, and even feel their crowns tottering on their heads;—to find their subjects for ever breeding rebellions, insurrections, and revolutions through impurities in their blood for lack of salt. Let such nations live and think correspondingly with the laws of despotism, priestcraft, and salt duties, and live, as they are governed, in fear;—but let the Anglo-Saxon be ruled by wisdom and by constitutional laws, based on a sense of duty, both divine and moral, by love and attachment to their sovereign, induced by freedom and the free use of salt.

Whenever salt is denied or sparingly taken, from whatever cause, the worst elements of man's nature are encouraged and induced; and, on the other hand, the more salt is used, the purer is the blood, and the more noble the race, in every bodily as well as mental attribute. Some nations seem never to have advanced, but continue animal, sensual, and cruel.

ETERNAL TORMENTS.

"No falsehood can last for ever. No! although it be buttressed by power, gilded by genius, sanctioned by success, believed by millions, and covered with the hoar of 1600 years, it must sooner or later die. Men at last discover their delusion, and they rise up to destroy it with a vehemence of indignation proportioned to the length of time it has lasted, and to the depth of the hold it has usurped over their hood-winked minds."—Geo. Gilfillan.

In a "Gospel Catechism for Children" by the Rev. J. Morison, we find the following query and reply:—"Why is it that the unholy must abide in the devil's hell for ever and ever? The unholy must abide in the devil's hell for ever and ever, and never be released, because without shedding of blood there is no remission of sins; and for the sins which they commit after they leave the earth, Christ never did, and never will die."—Ques. 184.

By "the devil's hell," the reverend author means "the everlasting fire" to which the finally impenitent, along with the devil and his angels, are consigned at the judgment. He assumes that the ungodly shall exist hereafter, and that they shall exist forever in these quenchless flames, that instead of being consumed by the fiery element, they shall, while eternity continues its round, be preserved alive amid the most fearful horrors and excruciating pains, for ever tossing on the angry billows of "shoreless woe."

To the inquiry, why is it that the ungodly must abide forever in this awful place, the answer given is substantially this: In an after state, the ungodly will commit sins which God has determined not to forgive. Truly, this is the most extraordinary apology for eternal torments it has been our lot to see or hear. So, then, men are to be punished with everlasting torments, not for transgressions done in the present, but for sins done in a future life; not for crimes on earth, but for sins in hell! Where in all the world did the learned gentleman obtain this information? For our part we know of no passage of Scripture which affirms that the ungodly are to be punished in a future life for sins committed there; and while we have a very high estimate of the learning and ability of the respected individual whose statements we are considering, we are by no means prepared to receive as true, so important a declaration, on any authority short of Scripture testimony; in the absence of such confirmation; we might simply, dismiss the case with a verdict of—not proven.

But we are not disposed so to let the matter pass: we not only want evidence of the statements being true,—we have evidence of its being false. First, The only punishment threatened in Scripture to the ungodly in the future, is for the "deeds done in the body:" the wicked are represented as being sent away to everlasting punishment, for sins they had committed in the present state of being. Secondly, The Bible represents the future punishment of the lost in such terms as "death—destruction—everlasting destruction—perdition—a being burned up like chaff and decayed vine branches—utterly perishing like brute beasts in their own corruption—being consumed, and vanishing into smoke like the fat of lambs," terms which necessarily preclude the idea of eternal preservation.

The argument we are now considering is another clear evidence of the pitiful necessities to which men are driven in their attempts to defend their pet theory of unending suffering,—another of their miserable shifts to make the doctrine of eternal misery appear somewhat compatible with reason and justice. Pressed with the idea that an eternity of suffering is out of all proportion as a punishment for the sins men commit during a lifetime, seldom extending beyond eighty years; that it appears something like cruelty and injustice to inflict unending misery on such a frail being as man is, surrounded from his birth by powerful and too-well adapted temptations to evil, yea, indeed, as the more orthodox affirm, being himself corrupt by nature, born with a bias towards evil; they have endeavored to render their theory somewhat feasible by affirming that the ungodly will be kept in "the devil's hell for ever," not for iniquities done here, but because, while bearing the punishment of sins done on earth, they will continue to transgress, and each new transgression calling for its own punishment, they shall thus go on sinning and suffering forever and evermore. And yet, after all, this view of the case, instead of presenting it as rationally defensible, only, if that were possible, makes the matter worse; for, be it observed, this continual persistance in sin is represented as part of the penal inflictions for sins done on earth, that is, the sinner is judicially sent, for trespasses committed in time, to a place of torment, where all saving and sanctifying influences are denied him; where, thus shut out from all hope and unchangeably surrounded by other beings as wicked, if not more so, than himself, he must remain as vile, nay, from the necessities of his nature, become progressively more corrupt, and thus his everlasting misery is inevitably insured.

How the advocates of this horrid system can represent God as treating his erring creatures thus, and, at the same time, believe him to be "the Lord God merciful and gracious," the God of love and the Creator of the human race, we cannot very well explain. To us and to many others, such dealings have always appeared incompatible with the attributes of Deity. Over such misrepresentations of our Father in heaven many have stumbled into infidelity, and have been thus cast afloat on the flood without an anchor, and without a helm. On many a pious heart has this hideous and execrable doctrine weighed like an incubus. Thanks be to God, thousands are beginning to see him in a new light; and they can exclaim, in reference to his dealings with the incorrigibly impenitent, as well as in regard to the whole circle of his other works, in the presence of the skeptic, "just and true are thy ways, thou King of Saints! Thy tender mercy is over all thy works!"

THE ROMANISTS.

We have stated in our previous issues that the next great conflict in this country, if not through Christendom, is to be with the Romanists. That they seek the civil power in this land is beyond all dispute: that they will ever obtain it we do not believe; but that they will nevertheless struggle for it most vehemently we have no doubt; and Protestantism will be tried as by fire. Let it cast off its Babylonish garments; especially that root of the whole system of Romanism, an immortal entity, called the soul, in man. If that was thoroughly eradicated from the theology of the age, Romanism would be but a dead carcass, and soon perish from off the face of the earth, along with it "Spiritualism" one of the Harlot's last daughters. "The Little Wanderers' Friend," of this city, in its issue for May, speaks of "THE HEATHEN OF NEW YORK" as follows:

How few realize that there are more children in this city that never go to Sabbath School than all the children in the Sandwich Islands—that there are more persons in the city who never go to church than the entire population of those islands—that the population below Canal Street exceeds the entire population of those islands. The little Ward in which we are located contains over 500 rum holes—more than 450 houses of degredation, and about 4000 children of suitable age to go to school. It contains a larger population that the city of Nashville, or any other town or city in Louisiana except New Orleans. The mass of the population consists of the most ignorant, bigoted, degraded, foreign Catholics, who know no higher law than the word of the Priests. Their Christianity is mere baptized heathenism, teaching that "Mass is a sacrament in which sins are forgiven by the Priest's absolution," that "in baptism we are made heirs of heaven and are cleansed from original sin;" that "we must accuse (confess) ourselves to the priest, and if we willfully conceal from him we lie to the Holy Ghost," that making satisfaction for sin consists in "doing the penance given by the Priest."

An indulgence of one hundred days may also be granted by kissing the medal devoutly and saying the prayer: "O Mary, conceived without sin, pray for us who have recourse to thee." Three hundred days indulgence are granted for offering the following: "Sweet heart of Mary, be my salvation." This is the kind of christianity taught by Romanism to the people. We are in the midst of it. Our Mission is in front of one of their large churches—under the shadow of their cross. They listen to our songs, while we witness their idolatry. They curse, while we gather in the children, teach them the truth, feed, clothe and send them to kind Christian homes. But say some very cautious ones "you had better say nothing that will give offence—it will arouse them against you."

We have sought to know our duty and for us the day has past for firing "blank cartridges." Protestantism or the heathenism of Rome must prevail. A more severe conflict is at hand than the one in which we are engaged. We need not look to politicians for aid. If we succeed, it must be by the power of truth, moving each individual heart and mind. If Romanism prevails, what have we left us that is worth having? What has it left to the people of Italy, Spain, Mexico and South America? Let it prevail, and what would become of our Sabbath Schools, Churches, Homes for Little Wanderers, Public Schools, Bibles, Tracts, anything, everything peculiar to us as Protestants and free men. Be still in the face of these dangers—in the beginning of this struggle? Never! "If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, let my right hand forget her cunning. If I do not remember thee, let my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth."

Every emigrant ship adds to the number of this class, and every train of cars is scattering them all over the land, where they will by every means in their power, advance the interests of Rome. We may reasonably expect the efforts now being made to encourage emigration, will bring to us this year 250,000 to 300,000 of this people. Let us meet them ere they leave the ship and extend to them the kind hand and the word of God. They are our misguided brothers. Let us be kind and teach them the truth. Let us help the needy and teach them the truth. Let us "gather the children in."

THOSE who deprecate the asking or giving a reason for their faith, must not wonder if it be supposed that they have a faith for which there is no reason.—Whately.

AGITATION.—Many persons are all the time saying, "These restless men—when will they cease agitating the community?" When God Almighty dethrones himself! When the sun, moon and stars, touched with confusion, crumble and fall headlong, and bring back again the realms of night, and death! There is to be no such thing as quiet. The law of life is a law of progression, evolution, development; and no sooner have you settled one question, than you find right behind it another question to be settled, as, if you watch the stem, you will find, right behind every unfolding leaf, another leaf ready to unfold. If, in a community, you settle the question of conscience in this direction, it only opens the door to settle another question in another direction. There is no such thing as getting rid of agitation. All fundamental questions are to be discussed again and again. You cannot overcome the tendency to evil so that it shall not reassert itself. There is no device that will cure once and for ever the desire of excess. It is a chronic, ever-recurring fact, and there must be a chronic, ever-recurring application of remedy.

We live in a world where the first condition of life is to be alive; where to be alive is to work; and where work is the equivalent which God demands for blessings bestowed. Work is the coin and currency of the realm. A man says, "I cannot bear these eternal agitations. No sooner is one question disposed of than whirl, whiz, comes up another for settlement. What shall I do?" Take a ticket of annihilation—that is your best remedy! Oh that God had made you a stone! Stones do not find any trouble in their dreams, or in their waking hours—H. W. Beecher.

EXPOSITION OF 1 COR. XV.

BY ELD. F. H. BURBANK.

Attempts have been made, to prove from this chapter that the wicked shall be raised from the dead. I have studied the chapter prayerfully, and am satisfied that the righteous only are spoken of by Paul, and will now produce my reasons for thus believing.

ATONEMENT and JUSTIFICATION.

"I delivered unto you first of all, that which I also received, how that Christ died for our sins, according the Scriptures; and that he was buried, and that he rose again the third day, according to the Scriptures."

In Rom. iv. 25, Paul writes that "Christ was delivered for our offences, and was raised again for our justification." The word "our" can have reference to none but Christians, for, while it is true that Christ "is the propitiation....for the sins of the whole world," it is equally as true that "justification without faith" is not a Bible doctrine. That precious Book teaches that there is "justification by faith," which excludes all unbelievers. I will give some examples. Rom. iii. 21–26, "But now the righteousness of God without the law is manifested, being witnessed by the law and the prophets; even the righteousness of God which is by faith of Jesus Christ, unto all, and upon all them that believe; for there is no difference; for all have sinned and come short of the glory of God; being justified freely by his grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus; whom God hath set forth to be a propitiation through faith in his blood, to declare his righteousness for the remission of sins that are past, through the forbearance of God; to declare at this time his righteousness, that he might be just, and the justifier of him which believeth in Jesus." Rom. v. 1, "Therefore, being justified by faith, we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ." Thus we prove that none can be justified without faith.

"Now if Christ be preached that he rose from the dead, how say some (brethren) among you that there is no resurrection of the dead....For if the dead rise not, then is Christ not raised; and if Christ be not raised, your faith is vain; ye are yet in your sins. Then they also which are fallen asleep in Christ are perished."

Here we learn that great truth, that our justification depends upon the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead; for, "he was delivered for our offences, and was raised again for our justification." Those Corinthians who denied the resurrection of the dead, believed that Christ was raised, but Paul shows them that "if the dead rise not, then is Christ not raised;" etc. The result would then be, "your faith is vain; ye are yet in your sins Then they which are fallen asleep in Christ are perished." How plain then, that "if Christ be not raised," there can be no such thing as justification; and as we are "justified by faith," our faith would then be "vain." "Then they also which are fallen asleep in Christ are perished." Yes, absolutely perished; beyond the possibility of a resurrection. Paul has laid down the premises, and it is plain, reasoning upon such premises, that the ungodly will not be raised from the dead. For, the unrepenting sinner occupies precisely the same position that the saint would occupy if Christ had not risen from the dead. The unbeliever does not exercise faith in Jesus Christ, hence he cannot be justified, and not being justified, he must "die in his sins," and all who have died in that condition, "are perished."

WITH WHAT BODY DO THEY COME?

"But some man (among you) will say, How are the dead raised up? and with what body do they come?" Upon examining all the passages in the chapter where the phrase "the dead" occurs, we have still farther evidence that the question is asked concerning the righteous:—"With what BODY do they come?" Certainly they speak of but one class when they say, "With what body, (not bodies) do they come?" The texts where the phrase "the dead" occurs are as follow: Ver. 12, "How say some among you that there is no resurrection of the dead." Ver. 13, "But if there be no resurrection of the dead." Ver. 16, "For if the dead rise not." Ver. 21, "By man came also the resurrection of the dead." Ver. 29, "Else what shall they do which are baptized for the dead if the dead rise not at all? Why are they then baptize for the dead?" Ver. 42, "So also is the resurrection of the dead." Ver. 52, "And the dead shall be raised incorrubtible."

Thus we find the phrase the dead throughout the chapter, and nothing to intimate that the wicked are included. Now we will notice the questions and answers:—

Question:—"How are the dead raised up?"

Answer:—"The dead are raised incorruptible."

Ques:—"With what body do they come?"

Ans:—"It is sown a natural BODY, it is raised a spiritual BODY."

An objection to this position is urged by some from the words, "And to every seed his own body." The objector ought to notice that Paul is there talking, not about men, but about seeds of grain. Hear Paul: "That which thou sowest, thou sowest not that body that shall be, but (a) bare grain, it may chance of wheat, or of some other grain, but God giveth it (the bare grain) a body (i. e., plant) as it hath pleased him, and to every seed his own body." Paul reasons analogically, bringing to their attention the sowing of grain. No matter what kind of grain they sowed, those kernels did not come up again, but bodies, or plants came up from them. Hence if they sowed wheat, wheat would come up, but not the grains that were sowed. If they planted, or sowed barley, the kernel sown would not come up, but something would come from it, a plant, bearing barley. Thus every seed had its own body. All that Paul attempts to prove by this analogy, is, that if we sow a body, a body will be raised; and, secondly, that the body raised is not the same kind of body that was buried. Hear Paul's statement of the case:—

"So also is the resurrection of the dead. It is sown in corruption, it is raised in incorruption. It is sown in dishonor, it is raised in glory: it sown in weakness, it is raised in power. It is sown a natural body, it is raised a spiritual body." Thus Paul has reasoned, and thus he has led me to believe.

Some declare that Paul asserts that there will be two kinds of bodies in the resurrection when he says, "There is a natural body, and there is a spiritual body." The entire verse with the one following, annihilates such a position. They read as follows:—"It is sown a natural body, it is raised a spiritual body. And so IT IS WRITTEN, The first man Adam was made a living soul (lit., living animal); the last Adam (was made) a quickening spirit." Paul has not contradicted himself. He nowhere intimates that "it is sown a natural body," and raised both natural and spiritual bodies. We now bear the image of the earthy. That is the natural body. We shall bear the image of the heavenly, at which time we shall have a "spiritual body." Christ is the "first fruits" of the great harvest, thereby we know what the harvest will be.

Strange as it may appear, there are a number who hold the following view: that, "being 'raised incorruptible' means, not the coming out of the grave, but the ascension into the air." I think that such a position is not sustained by the teachings of Christ and his apostles. When Christ said, "And as touching the dead that they rise," did he try to prove the ascension of the Patriarchs from the earth to heaven? When Christ sent word to John the Baptist that "the dead are raised up," did he inform him of their ascent into the air? When he said he should "be raised again the third day," did he teach that he should go to his Father on that morning? When we read that "the God of our fathers raised up Jesus," did Peter refer to his ascension? Such theology, I cannot conscientiously believe. I will remain in the old paths, for they declare that "the dead in Christ shall rise first, then we which are alive, and remain unto his coming shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air." If that "rise first" means as our friends teach, then we cannot go "up together with them," for they will ascend first, and we will ascend afterwards.

IN CHRIST ALL MADE ALIVE.

"As in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive." This text has been quoted as teaching the resurrection of the wicked and righteous; but I am certain, if that is the correct exposition, that nobody will be lost, and the doctrine of "universal salvation" is proved to be truth. It is clear to my mind that the text no more teaches the resurrection of the ungodly, than "For one man's disobedience many were made sinners, even so, by the obedience of one shall many be made righteous," teaches that all mankind will be saved. Compare the two texts, and it will be evident that the apostle speaks only of Christians. If that does not convince, perhaps the phrase "made alive" will. By citing the various texts where the original word for "made alive" occurs, we can understand its use and application. The texts are as follows:—

John v. 21, "For as the Father raiseth up the dead, and quickeneth (them); even so the Son quickeneth whom he will." John vi. 63, "It is the spirit that quickeneth." Rom. iv. 17, "God who quickeneth the dead." Rom. viii. 11, "But if the Spirit of him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, he that raised up Christ from the dead, shall also quicken your mortal bodies by (mar. because of) his Spirit that dwelleth in you." 1 Cor. xv. 22, "Even so in Christ shall all be made alive." 1 Cor. xv. 36, "That which thou sowest is not quickened, except it die." 1 Cor. xv. 45, "The last Adam (was made) a quickening spirit." 2 Cor. iii. 6, "The letter killeth, but the spirit giveth life. (Mar,, quickeneth)." Gal. iii. 21, "If there had been a law which could have given life, verily righteousness should have been by the law." 1 Tim. vi. 13, "I charge thee in the sight of God who quickeneth all things." 1 Pet. iii. 18, "For Christ hath once suffered for sins, the just for the unjust, that he might bring us to God, being put to death in the flesh, but quickened by the Spirit."

Thus Jesus, who is "resurrection and the life" "quickeneth whom he will." He will "quicken your mortal bodies by (because of) his Spirit that dwelleth in you" "If any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his." That man is in a lost condition. "And this is the Father's will which hath sent me, that of all which he hath given me I should lose NOTHING, but should raise it up again at the last day." "Those that thou gavest me I have kept, and none of them is lost, but (Judas) the son of perdition." He, went to "his own place."

The righteous are quickened, (made alive) because of (for this reason) his Spirit that dwelleth in them. The ungodly do not have the Spirit of Christ, hence they, if they do not repent, must die in their sins, without hope of being "made alive."

EVERY MAN IN HIS OWN ORDER.

"Even so in Christ shall all be made alive, but every man in his own order," rank, band, division, company. We have already shown that "made alive" means quickened, and that that quickening is accomplished by Jesus, who "quickeneth whom he will," and, that the dead are quickened "because of his Spirit that dwelleth in" them. This "order" must refer to Christians. Paul gives the order in the following words: "Christ the first fruits, afterwards they that are Christ's at his coming." It is possible that the order may refer chiefly to them "that are Christ's." Christ in all things must "have the pre-eminence." He is "the first-born from the dead." Then, the saints of God arise, each in his own order, or band.

Referring to John the Baptist, Christ says, "he that is least in the kingdom of heaven is greater that he." He says to the twelve, "In the regeneration, when the Son of man shall sit in the throne of his glory, ye also shall sit on twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel." Eternal life is the "free gift" which God bestows upon all saints; but it seems to be a Bible doctrine that all will not occupy the same position in the kingdom, for "he that is LEAST in the kingdom is greater than," John the Baptist.

THEN THE END.

"Then (cometh) the end, when he shall have delivered up the kingdom to God." Some think "the end" means the wicked. The verses preceding show plainly that such cannot be the case, but rather "the end" spoken of, is the end of Christ's reign, "for he must reign till he hath put all enemies under his feet. The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death." The orignal word for "end" in the text is Telos. It occurs forty-one times, and is rendered "end" thirty-five times. Eighteen times it refers to "the end of all things," which I believe to be the meaning in the text. It is rendered "custom" three times, "uttermost" once. In the other instances it is never used for the wicked, except to speak of their end, as, "whose end is destruction." To say that it means, "then cometh the wicked," I think is putting a strange interpretation to the text, which cannot be sustained by the context, or a single passage of scripture where the original word occurs. Togma, means "order, band, division;" but Telos does not mean "order," etc., but, "the end, custom, termination," etc.

Thus I have endeavored to give a general exposition of the chapter, and have written not to please men, but God, who trieth the heart. I love the doctrine of the resurrection, and hope to "attain unto the resurrection of the dead." Therefore, I seek grace from the Lord that I may be "steadfast, unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, forasmuch as (I) know that (my) labor is not in vain in the Lord." Yours in Christ.

MORE QUESTIONS.

BOSTON, July 5, 1865.

BR. CURRY:—Will you please answer a few more questions? In answer to the fourth question proposed by R. Cadwell you mention the whole creation as meaning all who have lived since Adam, or will live, (if I understood you rightly). Then you afterwards say that "Christ on the throne of David will be the guarantee of mercy to the whole creation." How can that be when, according to your belief, a portion of the whole creation have already perished? Then you mention the "rest of the dead." Who are they if not wicked dead? For it appears to me that all who have died in Christ are to be raised when he comes. Those who have died not in Christ have perished and can have no resurrection to life. Then again, you say the race of men shall be delivered ultimately. Does not the race of man include all mankind? We read that as it was in the days of Noah, so shall it be when the Son of man is revealed. They were eating and drinking, and knew not till the flood came and swept them all away. Now I have always supposed that with Christ's advent, his people both living and dead are rescued, and destruction comes upon all else.

One of the Readers of the Herald.

RESPONSE.—In looking over the article criticised, we fail to perceive that we made the phrase "whole creature" cover "all who have lived and will live" from Adam down. It is true that the phrase in itself implies as much and more; but we did not use it in its absolute sense: we gave it the qualified import demanded by the connection in which it occurs. When Paul declares that "the earnest expectation of the creation waiteth for the manifestation of the sons of God" he refers to that great mass of living humanity who are to be benefited by the "manifestation." He parallels the prediction in Genesis—"In thee shall all the families of the earth be blessed." "When the Son of man shall come in his glory, and all the holy angels with him, then shall he sit upon the throne of his glory; and before him shall be gathered all nations." Does this mean that every one that has lived will be gathered before the Son of man? Not at all. No more than Nebuchadnezzar did, when he issued his decrees unto "all people, nations, and languages." When Jesus comes as the heir of David's throne, there will be "given him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all peoples, nations, and languages shall serve him." The "whole creation" will be blessed when "the desire of all nations shall come."

In his remarks on the phrase "rest of the dead," our friend occupies the ground which we formerly held that all the dead who are to be saved will be raised at Christ's coming. We now make a distinction between those who "are Christ's at his coming" and the great body of the resurrected dead. As there is a distinction among the living at Christ's coming, so that a part are translated to sit with Christ on his throne, and another part become the happy subjects of the kingdom in their present mortal life; so we believe there is a corresponding distinction among the dead: one class are raised to sit with Christ at his throne, while the other more numerous body are saved in the final consummation of God's plan of redemption. We think that the Apostle Paul makes such a distinction in 1 Cor. xv. 22–24. "In Christ shall all be made alive; but every one in his own order: Christ the first fruits; afterward they that are Christ's at his coming; then the end, when he shall have delivered up the kingdom to God." "The end" here agrees with "rest of the dead" in the Apocalypse. But says our friend, "Who are the rest of the dead if not the wicked dead?" Let him first prove that the wicked dead are to be raised at all, before he expects an answer. We should as soon think of asking, "Who are the rest of 'the dead' if not 'the beasts that perish'?"

Our friend remarks: "You say that the race of man shall be delivered ultimately. Does not the race of man include all mankind?" After what we have said on "the whole creation" it is unnecessary to add more. When we say that the race of man will ultimately be delivered, we mean that the time will come when the earth will be filled by an immortalized race. When Christ comes his kingdom will be made up of immortals and mortals, but ultimately the latter will be made immortal and thus "the race" will be saved. As for all who have perished in their sins and all who shall in the future perish, they go back to mingle with the elements. They are cut off from the people. Having no longer an individuality, they are no more counted in the constituents of the race than if they had never been born. The good seed springs up to the harvest, leaving the bad seed "rotten under the clods," Joel; i. 17. "So may all thine enemies perish, O YAHVEH!"

THE BONAPARTEAN MESSIAH.

The Methodist Quarterly for July, in noticing the French Emperor's History of Julius Cæsar quotes the following from the preface:

"When Providence raises up such men as Cæsar, Charlemagne, and Napoleon, it is to trace out to peoples the path they ought to follow; to stamp with the seal of their genius a new era, and to accomplish in a few years the labor of many centuries. Happy the peoples who comprehend and follow them! woe to those who misunderstand and combat them! They do as the Jews did, they crucify their Messiah."

The Quarterly then says: "Our respectable author here precisely reverses our own version of the Gospel history. The Jews would have joyfully accepted a Bonapartean Messiah. Such a Messiah it is, that, when Satan says, 'All these things will I give thee if—' drops instantly upon a worshipping knee. And it is precisely because the man of Nazareth preferred to be God's Messiah, and not Satan's Messiah—that is, the Bonapartean Messiah—that the Jews rejected him. We suppose that few of the 'peoples' will deny to our present Napoleon a true Messiahship after the Satanic model. But our recognition of his high 'mission' in that line of transcendent but questionable characters, strangely permitted in the providential plan for good results, does not at all brighten the ethical estimate of his character. Men are not to be morally estimated by the good which Providence overrules their Satanic qualities to eventuate. God often damns 'his workmen, but carries on his work.'"

If any thing were needed to strengthen our conviction of the substantial accuracy of the belief that the Anti-Christ is yet to arise in the person of Louis Napoleon, it would be furnished by the comments, secular and religious, which appear from time to time in relation to the Emperor. (And here let us say, once for all, that when we mention the name of Louis Napoleon, it is always with a mental inclusion of the infant Prince of Algeria—Napoleon Louis Jean Joseph Bonaparte. If anything should happen in the future, which is scarcely probable, to remove the father from the world-stage on which he is the leading actor, the fact that the son bears the same fatal name, Louis Napoleon Bonaparte, would be a full warrant to look for the fulfilment of Scripture in his person). There never was a better elucidation, as far as it goes, of Rev. xvii. 8 than was unwittingly given in the N. Y. Tribune, March 29, 1856.

"It is but a little more than forty years since Walter Scott, expressing the intensity of the dread and hatred Napoleon had excited in the British heart, said in his haste that he should have been put to death as a noxious animal or a felon. For more than twenty years England had bent all her corporal and mental energies to the task of defeating and chastising the French Revolution. Hundreds of millions of money, and tens of thousands of lives had been lavished in the crusade, and seemed at last successful. The wicked Genius had been seized. imprisoned in the fatal casket, sealed with the signet of Solomon, and cast into the sea, to trouble the world no more. And lo! the casket has been fished up and opened, and the Imperial Shadow rules over Europe from behind the throne which owes all its pageantry and power to the magic of his name."

The text reads,—"The beast that thou sawest was, and is not; and shall ascend out of the abyss, [See Rev. xiii. 1. The LXX. render abussos for tehom, great deep, in Gen. i. 2; ii. 7.] and go into perdition: and they that dwell on the earth shall wonder, whose names were not written in the book of life from the foundation of the world, when they behold the beast that was, and is not, and yet is."

The foregoing extract from the Methodist Quarterly is another remarkable instance of unwitting exposition of the Scriptures. "The Jews would have joyfully accepted a Bonapartean Messiah." Yes, and it is just that Messiah that they will accept. The infidel Jews of the present day are prepared to hail Louis Napoleon as their Messiah. When "he confirms a covenant with many for one week" the prediction of Jesus will be fulfilled: "I am come in my Father's name, and ye receive me not: if another shall come in his own name, him ye will receive." The Quarterly could not have brought out the truth any clearer if it had known that this is the very man to whom "Satan says, 'All these things will I give thee, if thou wilt fall down and worship me.'" The Emperor has entered into a solemn covenant with the devil, who has carefully educated his Messiah for the coming work. That close observer of men and nations—Theodore Parker—uttered a truly Christian sentiment when he remarked,—"I hold Louis Napoleon in loathing, and count him a Beelzebub." Even that scoffer against Christianity, the Atlantic Monthly, bears witness to the Imperial pursuit of the Satanic gift. "No one can study him in the light of the past and not see that his is no ordinary ambition. To be the ruler of one kingdom does not fill out its measure. To be the arbiter of the fortunes of states, the genius who shall change the current of affairs and shape the destiny of the future—to exercise a power in every part of the globe, and to have a name familiar in every land and beneath every sun,—this is his ambition."—Atlantic Monthly, March, 1863.

Says the Quarterly: "It is precisely because the man of Nazareth preferred to be God's Messiah, and not Satan's Messiah—that is, the Bonapartean Messiah—that the Jews rejected him." The antithesis is obvious: "It is precisely because the man of" Strasburg and Boulogne "prefers to be Satan's Messiah—that is the Bonapartean Messiah—that the Jews" will receive him. Truly we are living in startling times, solemn times—too solemn for us to trifle with God's truth.

When unenlightened orthodoxy declares "that few of our peoples will deny to our present Napoleon a true Messiahship after the Satanic model," it behoves us to give heed to the significant announcement of the Apocalypse: "Here is wisdom. Let him that hath understanding count the number of the beast, for it is the number of a man." L. N. KALONMEROS. "His number is six hundred three score and six."

"World, do thou the signal dread,
We exalt the drooping head,
We uplift the expectant eye—
Our redemption draweth nigh."

TRADITION AND CHRONOLOGY.

Demetrius, who lived about B. C. 220, wrote a history of the Jewish kings. In this work the author follows the chronology of the LXX. which, there is no doubt, was, at that time, the same with the Hebrew; stating, that from Adam to the migration of Jacob's family into Egypt there elapsed a period of 3624 years; and that from the flood to the same migration the number of years was 1360. This statement agrees very nearly with that of the Greek version; for, according to it,

From the Creation to the deluge were 2226 years.
From the deluge to the birth of Abraham, 1092 years.
From the birth of Abraham to his leaving Haran, 75 years.
From thence to the migration of Jacob's family, 215 years.
3608 years.

This agreement is very remarkable; and as Demetrius wrote only about sixty years after the Septuagint translation was made, it is not to be supposed that, at so early a period, any material difference between the Greek and the Hebrew Scriptures could have taken place. (See Russell's Connection, Vol. i., p. 66.)

Eupolemus also, who wrote about fifty years after the last mentioned author, states, that it was 5149 years from Adam to the fifth year of Demetrius, king of Syria. This agrees exactly with the reckoning of Demetrius and the chronology of the Septuagint.

Still more important is the testimony of Josephus. This author, who was himself of the family of the priests, was perfectly acquainted with the Scriptures, as well as with the Septuagint, of which version he has given us an account. He published his great work on Jewish history and antiquities A. D. 90; and assures us, not only that the Septuagint was carefully examined and publicly approved, but also that he had translated the substance of his history from the Hebrew Scriptures. Yet, with few and unimportant exceptions, his chronology agrees with the Septuagint, as may be seen by a reference to the tables.

The foregoing testimonies, extending down to near the close of the first century, warrant the conclusion that to that time the discrepancies which harrass us had no existence, and that both versions agreed in teaching the chronology of the modern Septuagint.

There is another branch of evidence which is of the greatest importance. During the first century, the New Testament Scriptures were written under the plenary inspiration of the Holy Ghost. The authors of these books frequently refer to the Old Testament writings; and we may reasonably conclude that, in regard to chronology, and every other subject, they would certainly quote from the purest text of Moses and the prophets; yet, when we examine such quotations, as far as they relate to the subject under consideration, we find them uniformly at variance with the Hebrew text, and in agreement with the LXX.

The first text to which we refer is in Luke iii. 35, 36: "Sala, which was the Son of Cainan, which was the son of Arphaxad." The corresponding passage, in Gen. xi. 12, is thus given in the Hebrew Bible: "And Arphaxad lived five and thirty years, and begat Salah;" omitting entirely the name and generation of Cainan. The Septuagint, however, renders the passage thus: "And Arphaxad lived a hundred and thirty-five years, and begat Cainan....and Cainan lived a hundred and thirty years and begat Sala." The Septuagint, therefore, is found in perfect agreement with the Gospel, while the Hebrew and Samaritan omit the generation. Although this one circumstance does not invest the Septuagint generally with an authentic character, yet on this authority of Luke, who under the divine inspiration of the Holy Ghost this particular point of chronology is proved to be an omission in our authorized version of the Hebrew Scriptures.

We next turn to Exodus xii. 40, which according to the present Hebrew, reads: "Now the sojouring of the children of Israel, who dwelt in Egypt was four hundred and thirty years." This is clearly contrary to fact, as they dwelt in Egypt but two hundred and fifteen years. The Septuagint supplies an omission in the text: it reads, "And the sojourning of the children of Israel, while they sojourned in the land of Egypt and the land of Canaan, was four hundred and thirty years." This true and consistent sense is confirmed by apostolic authority; for St. Paul makes this period extend from the promise made to Abraham until the exodus. Gal. iii. 17.

There is another passage which, in fact, contains the only chronological statement found in the New Testament, and corresponds with the numbers of the Septuagint, while it is directly at variance with those of the modern Hebrew. We allude to the narative of St. Paul in Acts xiii. This holy man, when addressing the Jews at Antioch, reminded them, that God had brought their fathers out of Egypt with a high hand, and about the time of 40 years suffered he their manners in the wilderness. And when he had destroyed seven nations in the land of Canaan, he divided their land to them by lot. And after that he gave them judges about the space of four hundred and fifty years, until Samuel the prophet; and afterwards they desired a king: and God gave unto them Saul the son of Cis, a man of the tribe of Benjamin, by the space of 40 years. And when he had removed him, he raised up David to be their king."

The apostle here declares, that from the division of the land 'until Samuel the prophet, was about the space of 450 years.' If to that sum we add the years that passed be-

EXPOSITION OF 1 COR. XV.

BY ELD. F. H. BURBANK.

Attempts have been made, to prove from this chapter that the wicked shall be raised from the dead. I have studied the chapter prayerfully, and am satisfied that the righteous only are spoken of by Paul, and will now produce my reasons for thus believing.

ATONEMENT and JUSTIFICATION.

"I delivered unto you first of all, that which I also received, how that Christ died for our sins, according the Scriptures; and that he was buried, and that he rose again the third day, according to the Scriptures."

In Rom. iv. 25, Paul writes that "Christ was delivered for our offences, and was raised again for our justification." The word "our" can have reference to none but Christians, for, while it is true that Christ "is the propitiation....for the sins of the whole world," it is equally as true that "justification without faith" is not a Bible doctrine. That precious Book teaches that there is "justification by faith," which excludes all unbelievers. I will give some examples. Rom. iii. 21–26, "But now the righteousness of God without the law is manifested, being witnessed by the law and the prophets; even the righteousness of God which is by faith of Jesus Christ, unto all, and upon all them that believe; for there is no difference; for all have sinned and come short of the glory of God; being justified freely by his grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus; whom God hath set forth to be a propitiation through faith in his blood, to declare his righteousness for the remission of sins that are past, through the forbearance of God; to declare at this time his righteousness, that he might be just, and the justifier of him which believeth in Jesus." Rom. v. 1, "Therefore, being justified by faith, we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ." Thus we prove that none can be justified without faith.

"Now if Christ be preached that he rose from the dead, how say some (brethren) among you that there is no resurrection of the dead....For if the dead rise not, then is Christ not raised; and if Christ be not raised, your faith is vain; ye are yet in your sins. Then they also which are fallen asleep in Christ are perished."

Here we learn that great truth, that our justification depends upon the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead; for, "he was delivered for our offences, and was raised again for our justification." Those Corinthians who denied the resurrection of the dead, believed that Christ was raised, but Paul shows them that "if the dead rise not, then is Christ not raised;" etc. The result would then be, "your faith is vain; ye are yet in your sins Then they which are fallen asleep in Christ are perished." How plain then, that "if Christ be not raised," there can be no such thing as justification; and as we are "justified by faith," our faith would then be "vain." "Then they also which are fallen asleep in Christ are perished." Yes, absolutely perished; beyond the possibility of a resurrection. Paul has laid down the premises, and it is plain, reasoning upon such premises, that the ungodly will not be raised from the dead. For, the unrepenting sinner occupies precisely the same position that the saint would occupy if Christ had not risen from the dead. The unbeliever does not exercise faith in Jesus Christ, hence he cannot be justified, and not being justified, he must "die in his sins," and all who have died in that condition, "are perished."

WITH WHAT BODY DO THEY COME?

"But some man (among you) will say, How are the dead raised up? and with what body do they come?" Upon examining all the passages in the chapter where the phrase "the dead" occurs, we have still farther evidence that the question is asked concerning the righteous:—"With what BODY do they come?" Certainly they speak of but one class when they say, "With what body, (not bodies) do they come?" The texts where the phrase "the dead" occurs are as follow: Ver. 12, "How say some among you that there is no resurrection of the dead." Ver. 13, "But if there be no resurrection of the dead." Ver. 16, "For if the dead rise not." Ver. 21, "By man came also the resurrection of the dead." Ver. 29, "Else what shall they do which are baptized for the dead if the dead rise not at all? Why are they then baptize for the dead?" Ver. 42, "So also is the resurrection of the dead." Ver. 52, "And the dead shall be raised incorrubtible."

Thus we find the phrase the dead throughout the chapter, and nothing to intimate that the wicked are included. Now we will notice the questions and answers:—

Question:—"How are the dead raised up?"

Answer:—"The dead are raised incorruptible."

Ques:—"With what body do they come?"

Ans:—"It is sown a natural BODY, it is raised a spiritual BODY"

An objection to this position is urged by some from the words, "And to every seed his own body." The objector ought to notice that Paul is there talking, not about men, but about seeds of grain. Hear Paul: "That which thou sowest, thou sowest not that body that shall be, but (a) bare grain, it may chance of wheat, or of some other grain, but God giveth it (the bare grain) a body (i. e., plant) as it hath pleased him, and to every seed his own body." Paul reasons analogically, bringing to their attention the sowing of grain. No matter what kind of grain they sowed, those kernels did not come up again, but bodies, or plants came up from them. Hence if they sowed wheat, wheat would come up, but not the grains that were sowed. If they planted, or sowed barley, the kernel sown would not come up, but something would come from it, a plant, bearing barley. Thus every seed had its own body. All that Paul attempts to prove by this analogy, is, that if we sow a body, a body will be raised; and, secondly, that the body raised is not the same kind of body that was buried. Hear Paul's statement of the case:—

"So also is the resurrection of the dead. It is sown in corruption, it is raised in incorruption. It is sown in dishonor, it is raised in glory: it sown in weakness, it is raised in power. It is sown a natural body, it is raised a spiritual body." Thus Paul has reasoned, and thus he has led me to believe.

Some declare that Paul asserts that there will be two kinds of bodies in the resurrection when he says, "There is a natural body, and there is a spiritual body." The entire verse with the one following, annihilates such a position. They read as follows:—"It is sown a natural body, it is raised a spiritual body. And so IT IS WRITTEN, The first man Adam was made a living soul (lit., living animal); the last Adam (was made) a quickening spirit." Paul has not contradicted himself. He nowhere intimates that "it is sown a natural body," and raised both natural and spiritual bodies. We now bear the image of the earthy. That is the natural body. We shall bear the image of the heavenly, at which time we shall have a "spiritual body." Christ is the "first fruits" of the great harvest, thereby we know what the harvest will be.

Strange as it may appear, there are a number who hold the following view: that, "being 'raised incorruptible' means, not the coming out of the grave, but the ascension into the air." I think that such a position is not sustained by the teachings of Christ and his apostles. When Christ said, "And as touching the dead that they rise," did he try to prove the ascension of the Patriarchs from the earth to heaven? When Christ sent word to John the Baptist that "the dead are raised up," did he inform him of their ascent into the air? When he said he should "be raised again the third day," did he teach that he should go to his Father on that morning? When we read that "the God of our fathers raised up Jesus," did Peter refer to his ascension? Such theology, I cannot conscientiously believe. I will remain in the old paths, for they declare that "the dead in Christ shall rise first, then we which are alive, and remain unto his coming shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air." If that "rise first" means as our friends teach, then we cannot go "up together with them," for they will ascend first, and we will ascend afterwards.

IN CHRIST ALL MADE ALIVE.

"As in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive." This text has been quoted as teaching the resurrection of the wicked and righteous; but I am certain, if that is the correct exposition, that nobody will be lost, and the doctrine of "universal salvation" is proved to be truth. It is clear to my mind that the text no more teaches the resurrection of the ungodly, than "For one man's disobedience many were made sinners, even so, by the obedience of one shall many be made righteous," teaches that all mankind will be saved. Compare the two texts, and it will be evident that the apostle speaks only of Christians. If that does not convince, perhaps the phrase "made alive" will. By citing the various texts where the original word for "made alive" occurs, we can understand its use and application. The texts are as follows:—

John v. 21, "For as the Father raiseth up the dead, and quickeneth (them); even so the Son quickeneth whom he will." John vi. 63, "It is the spirit that quickeneth." Rom. iv. 17, "God who quickeneth the dead." Rom. viii. 11, "But if the Spirit of him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, he that raised up Christ from the dead, shall also quicken your mortal bodies by (mar. because of) his Spirit that dwelleth in you." 1 Cor. xv. 22, "Even so in Christ shall all be made alive." 1 Cor. xv. 36, "That which thou sowest is not quickened, except it die." 1 Cor. xv. 45, "The last Adam (was made) a quickening spirit." 2 Cor. iii. 6, "The letter killeth, but the spirit giveth life. (Mar,, quickeneth)." Gal. iii. 21, "If there had been a law which could have given life, verily righteousness should have been by the law." 1 Tim. vi. 13, "I charge thee in the sight of God who quickeneth all things." 1 Pet. iii. 18, "For Christ hath once suffered for sins, the just for the unjust, that he might bring us to God, being put to death in the flesh, but quickened by the Spirit."

Thus Jesus, who is "resurrection and the life" "quickeneth whom he will." He will "quicken your mortal bodies by (because of) his Spirit that dwelleth in you" "If any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his." That man is in a lost condition. "And this is the Father's will which hath sent me, that of all which he hath given me I should lose NOTHING, but should raise it up again at the last day." "Those that thou gavest me I have kept, and none of them is lost, but (Judas) the son of perdition." He, went to "his own place."

The righteous are quickened, (made alive) because of (for this reason) his Spirit that dwelleth in them. The ungodly do not have the Spirit of Christ, hence they, if they do not repent, must die in their sins, without hope of being "made alive."

EVERY MAN IN HIS OWN ORDER.

"Even so in Christ shall all be made alive, but every man in his own order," rank, band, division, company. We have already shown that "made alive" means quickened, and that that quickening is accomplished by Jesus, who "quickeneth whom he will," and, that the dead are quickened "because of his Spirit that dwelleth in" them. This "order" must refer to Christians. Paul gives the order in the following words: "Christ the first fruits, afterwards they that are Christ's at his coming." It is possible that the order may refer chiefly to them "that are Christ's." Christ in all things must "have the pre-eminence." He is "the first-born from the dead." Then, the saints of God arise, each in his own order, or band.

Referring to John the Baptist, Christ says, "he that is least in the kingdom of heaven is greater that he." He says to the twelve, "In the regeneration, when the Son of man shall sit in the throne of his glory, ye also shall sit on twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel." Eternal life is the "free gift" which God bestows upon all saints; but it seems to be a Bible doctrine that all will not occupy the same position in the kingdom, for "he that is LEAST in the kingdom is greater than," John the Baptist.

THEN THE END.

"Then (cometh) the end, when he shall have delivered up the kingdom to God." Some think "the end" means the wicked. The verses preceding show plainly that such cannot be the case, but rather "the end" spoken of, is the end of Christ's reign, "for he must reign till he hath put all enemies under his feet. The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death." The orignal word for "end" in the text is Telos. It occurs forty-one times, and is rendered "end" thirty-five times. Eighteen times it refers to "the end of all things," which I believe to be the meaning in the text. It is rendered "custom" three times, "uttermost" once. In the other instances it is never used for the wicked, except to speak of their end, as, "whose end is destruction." To say that it means, "then cometh the wicked," I think is putting a strange interpretation to the text, which cannot be sustained by the context, or a single passage of scripture where the original word occurs. Togma, means "order, band, division;" but Telos does not mean "order," etc., but, "the end, custom, termination," etc.

Thus I have endeavored to give a general exposition of the chapter, and have written not to please men, but God, who trieth the heart. I love the doctrine of the resurrection, and hope to "attain unto the resurrection of the dead." Therefore, I seek grace from the Lord that I may be "steadfast, unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, forasmuch as (I) know that (my) labor is not in vain in the Lord." Yours in Christ.

MORE QUESTIONS.

BOSTON, July 5, 1865.

BR. CURRY:—Will you please answer a few more questions? In answer to the fourth question proposed by R. Cadwell you mention the whole creation as meaning all who have lived since Adam, or will live, (if I understood you rightly). Then you afterwards say that "Christ on the throne of David will be the guarantee of mercy to the whole creation." How can that be when, according to your belief, a portion of the whole creation have already perished? Then you mention the "rest of the dead." Who are they if not wicked dead? For it appears to me that all who have died in Christ are to be raised when he comes. Those who have died not in Christ have perished and can have no resurrection to life. Then again, you say the race of men shall be delivered ultimately. Does not the race of man include all mankind? We read that as it was in the days of Noah, so shall it be when the Son of man is revealed. They were eating and drinking, and knew not till the flood came and swept them all away. Now I have always supposed that with Christ's advent, his people both living and dead are rescued, and destruction comes upon all else.

One of the Readers of the Herald.

RESPONSE.—In looking over the article criticised, we fail to perceive that we made the phrase "whole creature" cover "all who have lived and will live" from Adam down. It is true that the phrase in itself implies as much and more; but we did not use it in its absolute sense: we gave it the qualified import demanded by the connection in which it occurs. When Paul declares that "the earnest expectation of the creation waiteth for the manifestation of the sons of God" he refers to that great mass of living humanity who are to be benefited by the "manifestation." He parallells the prediction in Genesis—"In thee shall all the families of the earth be blessed." "When the Son of man shall come in his glory, and all the holy angels with him, then shall he sit upon the throne of his glory; and before him shall be gathered all nations." Does this mean that every one that has lived will be gathered before the Son of man? Not at all. No more than Nebuchadnezzar did, when he issued his decrees unto "all people, nations, and languages." When Jesus comes as the heir of David's throne, there will be "given him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all peoples, nations, and languages shall serve him." The "whole creation" will be blessed when "the desire of all nations shall come."

In his remarks on the phrase "rest of the dead," our friend occupies the ground which we formerly held that all the dead who are to be saved will be raised at Christ's coming. We now make a distinction between those who "are Christ's at his coming" and the great body of the resurrected dead. As there is a distinction among the living at Christ's coming, so that a part are translated to sit with Christ on his throne, and another part become the happy subjects of the kingdom in their present mortal life; so we believe there is a corresponding distinction among the dead: one class are raised to sit with Christ at his throne, while the other more numerous body are saved in the final consummation of God's plan of redemption. We think that the Apostle Paul makes such a distinction in 1 Cor. xv. 22–24. "In Christ shall all be made alive; but every one in his own order: Christ the first fruits; afterward they that are Christ's at his coming; then the end, when he shall have delivered up the kingdom to God." "The end" here agrees with "rest of the dead" in the Aposcalypse. But says our friend, "Who are the rest of the dead if not the wicked dead?" Let him first prove that the wicked dead are to be raised at all, before he expects an answer. We should as soon think of asking, "Who are the rest of 'the dead' if not 'the beasts that perish'?"

Our friend remarks: "You say that the race of man shall be delivered ultimately. Does not the race of man include all mankind?" After what we have said on "the whole creation" it is unnecessary to add more. When we say that the race of man will ultimately be delivered, we mean that the time will come when the earth will be filled by an immortalized race. When Christ comes his kingdom will be made up of immortals and mortals, but ultimately the latter will be made immortal and thus "the race" will be saved. As for all who have perished in their sins and all who shall in the future perish, they go back to mingle with the elements. They are cut off from the people. Having no longer an individuality, they are no more counted in the constituents of the race than if they had never been born. The good seed springs up to the harvest, leaving the bad seed "rotten under the clods," Joel; i. 17. "So may all thine enemies perish, O YAHVEH!"

THE BONAPARTEAN MESSIAH.

The Methodist Quarterly for July, in noticing the French Emperor's History of Julius Cæsar quotes the following from the preface:

"When Providence raises up such men as Cæsar, Charlemagne, and Napoleon, it is to trace out to peoples the path they ought to follow; to stamp with the seal of their genius a new era, and to accomplish in a few years the labor of many centuries. Happy the peoples who comprehend and follow them! woe to those who misunderstand and combat them! They do as the Jews did, they crucify their Messiah."

The Quarterly then says: "Our respectable author here precisely reverses our own version of the Gospel history. The Jews would have joyfully accepted a Bonapartean Messiah. Such a Messiah it is, that, when Satan says, 'All these things will I give thee if—' drops instantly upon a worshipping knee. And it is precisely because the man of Nazareth preferred to be God's Messiah, and not Satan's Messiah—that is, the Bonapartean Messiah—that the Jews rejected him. We suppose that few of the 'peoples' will deny to our present Napoleon a true Messiahship after the Satanic model. But our recognition of his high 'mission' in that line of transcendent but questionable characters, strangely permitted in the providential plan for good results, does not at all brighten the ethical estimate of his character. Men are not to be morally estimated by the good which Providence overrules their Satanic qualities to eventuate. God often damns 'his workmen, but carries on his work.'"

If any thing were needed to strengthen our conviction of the substantial accuracy of the belief that the Anti-Christ is yet to arise in the person of Louis Napoleon, it would be furnished by the comments, secular and religious, which appear from time to time in relation to the Emperor. (And here let us say, once for all, that when we mention the name of Louis Napoleon, it is always with a mental inclusion of the infant Prince of Algeria—Napoleon Louis Jean Joseph Bonaparte. If anything should happen in the future, which is scarcely probable, to remove the father from the world-stage on which he is the leading actor, the fact that the son bears the same fatal name, Louis Napoleon Bonaparte, would be a full warrant to look for the fulfilment of Scripture in his person). There never was a better elucidation, as far as it goes, of Rev. xvii. 8 than was unwittingly given in the N. Y. Tribune, March 29, 1856.

"It is but a little more than forty years since Walter Scott, expressing the intensity of the dread and hatred Napoleon had excited in the British heart, said in his haste that he should have been put to death as a noxious animal or a felon. For more than twenty years England had bent all her corporal and mental energies to the task of defeating and chastising the French Revolution. Hundreds of millions of money, and tens of thousands of lives had been lavished in the crusade, and seemed at last successful. The wicked Genius had been seized. imprisoned in the fatal casket, sealed with the signet of Solomon, and cast into the sea, to trouble the world no more. And lo! the casket has been fished up and opened, and the Imperial Shadow rules over Europe from behind the throne which owes all its pageantry and power to the magic of his name."

The text reads,—"The beast that thou sawest was, and is not; and shall ascend out of the abyss, [See Rev. xiii. 1. The LXX. render abussos for tehom, great deep, in Gen. i. 2; ii. 7.] and go into perdition: and they that dwell on the earth shall wonder, whose names were not written in the book of life from the foundation of the world, when they behold the beast that was, and is not, and yet is."

The foregoing extract from the Methodist Quarterly is another remarkable instance of unwitting exposition of the Scriptures. "The Jews would have joyfully accepted a Bonapartean Messiah." Yes, and it is just that Messiah that they will accept. The infidel Jews of the present day are prepared to hail Louis Napoleon as their Messiah. When "he confirms a covenant with many for one week" the prediction of Jesus will be fulfilled: "I am come in my Father's name, and ye receive me not: if another shall come in his own name, him ye will receive." The Quarterly could not have brought out the truth any clearer if it had known that this is the very man to whom "Satan says, 'All these things will I give thee, if thou wilt fall down and worship me.'" The Emperor has entered into a solemn covenant with the devil, who has carefully educated his Messiah for the coming work. That close observer of men and nations—Theodore Parker—uttered a truly Christian sentiment when he remarked,—"I hold Louis Napoleon in loathing, and count him a Beelzebub." Even that scoffer against Christianity, the Atlantic Monthly, bears witness to the Imperial pursuit of the Satanic gift. "No one can study him in the light of the past and not see that his is no ordinary ambition. To be the ruler of one kingdom does not fill out its measure. To be the arbiter of the fortunes of states, the genius who shall change the current of affairs and shape the destiny of the future—to exercise a power in every part of the globe, and to have a name familiar in every land and beneath every sun,—this is his ambition."—Atlantic Monthly, March, 1863.

Says the Quarterly: "It is precisely because the man of Nazareth preferred to be God's Messiah, and not Satan's Messiah—that is, the Bonapartean Messiah—that the Jews rejected him." The antithesis is obvious: "It is precisely because the man of" Strasburg and Boulogne "prefers to be Satan's Messiah—that is the Bonapartean Messiah—that the Jews" will receive him. Truly we are living in startling times, solemn times—too solemn for us to trifle with God's truth.

When unenlightened orthodoxy declares "that few of our peoples will deny to our present Napoleon a true Messiahship after the Satanic model," it behoves us to give heed to the significant announcement of the Apocalypse: "Here is wisdom. Let him that hath understanding count the number of the beast, for it is the number of a man." L. N. KALONMEROS. "His number is six hundred three score and six."

"World, do thou the signal dread,
We exalt the drooping head,
We uplift the expectant eye—
Our redemption draweth nigh."

TRADITION AND CHRONOLOGY.

Demetrius, who lived about B. C. 220, wrote a history of the Jewish kings. In this work the author follows the chronology of the LXX. which, there is no doubt, was, at that time, the same with the Hebrew; stating, that from Adam to the migration of Jacob's family into Egypt there elapsed a period of 3624 years; and that from the flood to the same migration the number of years was 1360. This statement agrees very nearly with that of the Greek version; for, according to it,

From the Creation to the deluge were	2226 years.
From the deluge to the birth of Abraham,	1092 years.
From the birth of Abraham to his leaving Haran,	75 years.
	3608 years.

This agreement is very remarkable; and as Demetrius wrote only about sixty years after the Septuagint translation was made, it is not to be supposed that, at so early a period, any material difference between the Greek and the Hebrew Scriptures could have taken place. (See Russell's Connection, Vol. i., p. 66.)

Eupolemus also, who wrote about fifty years after the last mentioned author, states, that it was 5149 years from Adam to the fifth year of Demetrius, king of Syria. This agrees exactly with the reckoning of Demetrius and the chronology of the Septuagint.

Still more important is the testimony of Josephus. This author, who was himself of the family of the priests, was perfectly acquainted with the Scriptures, as well as with the Septuagint, of which version he has given us an account. He published his great work on Jewish history and antiquities A. D. 90; and assures us, not only that the Septuagint was carefully examined and publicly approved, but also that he had translated the substance of his history from the Hebrew Scriptures Yet, with few and unimportant exceptions, his chronology agrees with the Septuagint, as may be seen by a reference to the tables.

"The foregoing testimonies, extending down to near the close of the first century, warrant the conclusion that to that time the discrepancies which harrass us had no existence, and that both versions agreed in teaching the chronology of the modern Septuagint.

There is another branch of evidence which is of the greatest importance. During the first century, the New Testament Scriptures were written under the plenary inspiration of the Holy Ghost. The authors of these books frequently refer to the Old Testament writings; and we may reasonably conclude that, in regard to chronology, and every other subject, they would certainly quote from the purest text of Moses and the prophets; yet, when we examine such quotations, as far as they relate to the subject under consideration, we find them uniformly at variance with the Hebrew text, and in agreement with the LXX.

The first text to which we refer is in Luke iii. 35, 36: "Sala, which was the Son of Cainan, which was the son of Arphaxad." The corresponding passage, in Gen. xi. 12, is thus given in the Hebrew Bible: "And Arphaxad lived five and thirty years, and begat Salah;" omitting entirely the name and generation of Cainan. The Septuagint, however, renders the passage thus: "And Arphaxad lived a hundred and thirty-five years, and begat Cainan....and Cainan lived a hundred and thirty years and begat Sala." The Septuagint, therefore, is found in perfect agreement with the Gospel, while the Hebrew and Samaritan omit the generation. Although this one circumstance does not invest the Septuagint generally with an authentic character, yet on this authority of Luke, who under the divine inspiration of the Holy Ghost this particular point of chronology is proved to be an omission in our authorized version of the Hebrew Scriptures.

We next turn to Exodus xii. 40, which according to the present Hebrew, reads: "Now the sojouring of the children of Israel, who dwelt in Egypt was four hundred and thirty years." This is clearly contrary to fact, as they dwelt in Egypt but two hundred and fifteen years. The Septuagint supplies an omission in the text: it reads, "And the sojourning of the children of Israel, while they sojourned in the land of Egypt and the land of Canaan, was four hundred and thirty years." This true and consistent sense is confirmed by apostolic authority; for St. Paul makes this period extend from the promise made to Abraham until the exodus. Gal. iii. 17.

There is another passage which, in fact, contains the only chronological statement found in the New Testament, and corresponds with the numbers of the Septuagint, while it is directly at variance with those of the modern Hebrew. We allude to the narative of St. Paul in Acts xiii. This holy man, when addressing the Jews at Antioch, reminded them, that God had brought their fathers out of Egypt with a high hand, and about the time of 40 years suffered he their manners in the wilderness. And when he had destroyed seven nations in the land of Canaan, he divided their land to them by lot. And after that he gave them judges about the space of four hundred and fifty years, until Samuel the prophet; and afterwards they desired a king: and God gave unto them Saul the son of Cis, a man of the tribe of Benjamin, by the space of 40 years. And when he had removed him, he raised up David to be their king."

The apostle here declares, that from the division of the land 'until Samuel the prophet, was about the space of 450 years.' If to that sum we add the years that passed between the exode and the partition of the promised inheritance, and also the time that the government of the Hebrews was exercised by Samuel, Saul, and David, with the first three years of Solomon, we shall find that, in extending the period from the departure of the children of Israel out of Egypt to the foundation of the temple, the historical outline given by St. Paul accords precisely with the numbers of Josephus, and consequently with the numbers contained in the Greek and Hebrew Scriptures, as they existed in his days.

From division to Samuel,	450 years.
From government of Samuel,	12 years.
From reign of Saul,	40 years.
From reign of David,	40 years.
From first three years of Solomon,	3 years.
	591. years.

Yet Archbishop Usher, following the modern Hebrew, makes this period but 480 years.

Now Josephus relates, that the temple was begun in the fourth year of Solomon, 592 years after the people were delivered from Egyptian bondage: and it is worthy of especial remark, that, in regard to the dates of these memorable occurrences, we have found the judgment of this historian confirmed by the narative of an inspired apostle. Such a complete agreement in regard to very ancient epochs is hardly to be expected; but when it does occur, it leaves no room for doubt that the several writers must have followed an authority essentially the same; and that the archives whence they derived their materials had not yet been tampered with by the deceitful genius of hypothesis and controversy.—Russell's Connection, Vol. i. p. 67. We might add to this evidence but forbear.

What are the facts which we have elicited? That the Hebrew Scriptures, as they were held by the Jewish church, were translated into Greek about 280 years before the Christian era; that the translation obtained the universal approbation of the Jewish authorities; that for nearly 400 years no whisper of complaint at unfaithfulness in the translators, or discrepancy in the chronological numbers, was heard from any quarter; and that the most eminent historians living in different parts of this period, and the inspired writers of the New Testament canon, unite in adopting a scheme of chronology, as then authorized, which is found to differ entirely from the present Hebrew computation, and to be in exact agreement with the Septuagint numbers. From such facts, what is the inevitable conclusion? Is it not that, during the time in question, the Hebrew and Greek copies must have taught the same chronology, and that, since then, the Hebrew has been altered to its present state?

We are now prepared to state, that, from 280 B. C. to the end of the first century, the Hebrew and Greek numbers were identical, and that both were the same as we have them now in the Septuagint. We are led therefore to the enquiry, When, by whom, and for what purpose, could this alteration have been made?

Before we enter upon this question, we may observe, that, whatever answer may ultimately be given to these queries, it is certain the alteration must have been intentional and systematic: it is absolutely impossible that the change could have been the result of accident or error. We mention this that objections raised may possess full strength.

Extracts of Letters.

James H. Wiggins, Factoryville, Pa., writes:—Is your paper the Herald of Life still published? If so, I want it. I have read several volumes of the Bible Examiner, and some of your books and papers. I now have your book, "Life only in Christ." I am a member of the M. E. Chsrch, and a Superintendent of a Sabbath School, yet am a firm believer in the doctrine of Life only in Christ. The subject was first introduced to me by Br. Collamore, of the 57th Penn. Regt., in 1862. I studied for a year diligently, and made up my mind that "Life only in Christ" is the true theory of the Bible. If your paper is still published, please let me know, and I will send the money. I was mustered out of the United States service Dec. 8, 1864, I have been waiting for spare money to send for the Herald of Life; that time has come.

Note by Editor,—Br. Wiggins is one of those in the army who had access to the many works we sent to Br. Collamore while in the U. S. service. The seed then sown, we have always believed would spring up. We sent thousands of odd numbers of the Bible Examiner, and thousands of the Herald of Life, as well as many books, pamplets, and tracts, to the army; thus casting bread on the waters, and we are sure the harvest will yet come, and the Lord will be glorified in the spread of truth and the removal of error.

Geo. Atkinson, North Attleboro; Mass., writes:—I have never expressed to you my estimation of the Herald of Life. It suits me well. Not to please the flesh; but it gives strong and true food to a truth lover. My Bible is more full of light and comfort than ever. Some twenty years ago your Six Sermons let day-light into me, but my previous teachings were so deeply rooted that it took some fifteen years to get away from them: but I swing clear now.

Joseph T. Curry will preach at New Salem, Ulster Co., N. Y., each evening this week and next Lord's day.

The Herald of Life.

NEW YORK, AUGUST 2, 1865.

NO IMMORTALITY NOR FUTURE LIFE, EXCEPT IN JESUS CHRIST ALONE, AND BY A RESURRECTION AT THE LAST DAY IF DEAD, OR A CHANGE IF ALIVE.

Our Annual Meeting.

The annual meeting of the "Life and Advent Union" will be held in Rice's Hall, Springfield, Mass., August 25, 1865, at 2 P. M. We trust that all who can, will come and show by their presence their interest in the cause of truth. Never was there a greater need for honest, earnest, persevering effort than at the present moment. The Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ is now, as it ever has been, the great panacea for earthly ills, the great antidote to the poison of Satanic error, the great key to the purposes of God, the great expositor of man's destiny, the great light that pierces the darkness of the valley of the shadow of death and enables us to see our path to a future and eternal life. Can we be too earnest in carrying these glad tidings to our fellow-men? Can we be too anxious that the thousands of our fellow Christians who are led astray by the serpent lie should learn "a more excellent way"? Can we be too uncompromising in our active opposition to that last trick of the devil, which falsely names itself Spiritualism? Let our answer be emphatic. Let all who can, come to our annual meeting, prepared to show their estimation of their responsibility by united action for the systematic spread of the truth.

We have a suggestion to make to those who will not find it practicable to attend the meeting. Let all such who feel disposed write their sentiments, at length or in brief, as the case may be, and send their communications to be read before the meeting. Direct to Joseph T. Curry, Box 393, Springfield, Mass. There is no reason that we should not have a gathering in spirit of every friend of the Life theme. Let us have a load of letters.

And now we commend this and all other schemes for the spread of the Gospel to the prayers of the saints every where. "The fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much."

The Western Mission.

The time for which Br. Campbell went West to labor has fully expired, yet he is still in the work there. Shall this Mission be sustained and continued? We are satisfied it should be, and hope all the friends will be of the same mind. In order for it to be continued, we need more funds. The least we can do is to support Br. Campbell's family, if he is is to remain absent from them. But besides this, he must have papers and tracts to distribute, and he will have other unavoidable expenses in getting over the country. We earnestly appeal, therefore, to all the lovers of the life theme to come forward with their free-will offerings for this special object. We are quite sure the appeal will not be in vain. Let us hear from the willing hearted at once; as it is important to know soon what we can do further for this mission.

Our Paper.

Granville, N. Y., July 28, 1865.

Br. Storrs:—Since our conversation, a few days ago, during which the prospects of the "Herald of Life" was briefly alluded to, I have thought much upon the matter; have viewed it in its different aspects, have weighed it as carefully as I am capable of doing, and all my reasonings upon the subject centre in the one conclusion that its circulation as a weekly should be both sustained and increased. Nor have I much fear that any considerable number of its supporters—if in fact any at all—will view the subject differently; for I have not the faintest shadow of a doubt that the work was instituted in the wise ordering of Divine Providence and that a vigorous prosecution of it is equally in accordance with his most holy will.

With what sublime, crowning and eternal truths does the paper go forth freighted to its readers. It glows with the marvelous light that is now shining through the sacred Scriptures upon the world's pathway. In oppsition to the greatest doctrinal error of the age, and to which Satan's first lie gave birth, it fearlessly maintains the great fact that man is a unit, wholly mortal, hastening unto death; and if he fails to form a union with Jesus the "Life-giver" he sinks down to destruction, is utterly extinguished, "quenched as tow." It proclaims the great truth of man's unconsciousness, between death and the resurrection.

But, say some, what a terrible thought. With what coldness and cheerlessness does it invest death! Yes, that is just what God intended it should be invested with. He never introduced it as a thing to be desired. The ridiculous idea that it is only "the gate to heaven" is purely an invention of man, contradicted alike by reason and the word of God.

"Death the gate to glory!" Not so thought good Hezekiah, when with face turned to the wall and eye streaming with tears he prayed so fervently to the Lord to revoke that fearful mandate given through the Prophet Isaiah—"Set thine house in order for thou shalt die and not live." One advocating the popular theory might imagine that Hezekiah was so happily situated at the head of his government that he did not want to go where he would be eternally happy! But not so. Hezekiah was afflicted like other men. That old Assyrian king Sennacherib worried him terribly; and as for glory, he probably longed for that, but did not care to go there that way.

"Death the gate glory!" Not so spake the Lord through his servant Jeremiah, when he foretells the fulfilment of Herod's bloody infant-slaying decree and comforts those bereaved mothers with the assurance that their loved, but slaughtered ones "shall come again from the land of the enemy." Not so thought Paul and his fellow-laborers, when sorely persecuted in Asia, "pressed out of measure, beyond strength, insomuch that" they "despaired even of life;" but says he, "we trusted in God," who takes saints to glory when they die? No, no: but "which raiseth the dead."

Our paper proclaims the coming of Jesus nigh, and the approach of the saints' deliverance; both those who wake and those who sleep. It echoes the prophetic assurance that they have not long to wait. Not many days to suffer, nor many nights to watch. What consolation to those who fall asleep in Jesus. What consolation to us all. With those who die in Christ, in these last days, it is the lying down to sleep in the third and fourth watches of the night; for soon the morning dawns. The Lord is near and a reunion not far off. Soon we may catch the first notes of the mighty, mighty trumpet sound. Already we see Satan marshaling his hosts for a final conflict; and soon we may hear the distant roaring of the great battle that is to sweep in vengeance over the plains of Armageddon.

These are a few of the many and kindred truths to the spreading of which the paper devotes its strength. They are glorious truths and truth ever sanctifies.

Why not then an effort be made to raise a sum sufficient to guarantee the gratuitous circulation of some hundreds of copies of the paper, or a corresponding quantity fo tracts, weekly? It will require an effort and a sacrifice; but who can better afford to labor and make sacrifices than they who have received so much truth? Nay, of whom is it so imperatively required?

Often when looking over the various religious denominations, and have considered the slight advancement they have made in the great truths that are being unfolded to the world, having far less of truth than error incorporated in their faith, I have been filled with both joy and surprise at the vast amount of good they are accomplishing in winning sinners unto Christ, in elevating the morals and alleviating the sufferings of poor fallen humanity. May not then the very important query be put to ourselves, how are we discharging the responsibilities that rest upon us and, necessarily growing out of the bestowal of those choice blessings that truth ever imparts? Let us not in any degree prove recreant to the trust confided to us, but be equal to the emergency. Let us cry out mightily unto God, that he pour forth abundantly of his Holy Spirit upon us. That Spirit without which our labor will be in vain and we shall hold the truth in righteousness.

May God help us all at all times, to seek his glory and not our own; striving always to exalt the great name of Jesus Christ in an ungodly world. The time is short. A few more days shall come and go, marking the progress of time, and then shall be ushered in the never-ending day. A few more joys with which to be blessed, and we shall come to the fountain of everlasting joy. A few more sorrows to be endured, and we "shall enter in through the gate into the City" where sorrow cometh not. A few more meetings and a few more partings, a few more ties formed, and a few more bonds severed, and the long dark night of sorrow will have ended and the morning, bright and glorious, will appear. May we all hold fast unto the end, laboring diligently to secure the inestimable prize, eternal life through Jesus Christ at his appearing and kingdom.

Yours in hope.

Remarks on Rom. viii.—1—8.

Introductory Remark.—Man is dying, perishing—i. e., the whole man. In this dying state, he is called "flesh,"—which is but another word for animal—the whole man is called so; because he is corruptible—not immortal—and is under the government of animal appetites.

"There is therefore now no condemnation to those who are in Christ;" [in him is eternal life,] "who" [being in him, i. e., having eternal life] "walk not after the flesh," [the dying animal man who has not eternal life] "but after the Spirit" [the spiritual, or eternal life that he has by being in Christ.]

"For the law of the Spirit of life" [the law or power of this spiritual, or eternal life] "in Christ hath made me free from the law" [the power,—for where the word of a king is there is power] "of sin and death." [He was dying—under the power of death, but by being in Christ he is made free from that law, or power, and has eternal life.]

"For what the law could not do, in that it was weak through the flesh" [i. e., the law had not power to give man life—man was perishing—the law could only show its claims, but could impart no power to obey—so man must perish for all the law could do to help him. In this situation] "God sending His own Son in the likeness of sinful flesh," [in the likeness of man] "and for sin, condemned sin in the flesh;" [took away its binding, destroying power] "that the righteousness of the law" [the righteous claims of the law] "might be fulfilled in us, who walk not after the flesh" [the dying, perishing, animal man] "but after the Spirit," [after the spiritual or eternal life he has by being in Christ Jesus.]

"For they that are after the flesh" [living after the perishing, animal man] "do mind the things of the flesh;" [corruptible things] "but they that are after the Spirit" [spiritual, or eternal life] "the things of the Spirit," [the things of that life. How true is this, that they who are after eternal life mind the things of that life. While they that are after the corruptible, dying man, are engrossed with such things as please a dying corruptible, animal, and perishing man.] "For to be carnally minded" [to have the mind taken up with perishing objects, as all men do who are not made alive to God] "is death;" [is evidence that the man is not alive to God—and that the result will be death] "but to be spiritually minded" [the opposite of carnally minded] "is life and peace," [is evidence that he is made alive, or has passed from a state of condemnation to death, to justification of life; and the consequence is peace with God.]

"Because the carnal mind," [the fleshly, perishing mind,] "is enmity against God:" [God is life, man with a carnal mind is dead—dying; and thus is in perfect hostility to God, or the opposite of God:] "for it is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be." [Under the control of the animal and no power to obey: their guilt does not consist in the fact that they find themselves in that state, but that they refuse to come to Christ that they may have life. "This is their condemnation, that light has come into the world," &c. So that by refusing life, they refuse power to obey the law of God, or become subject to it. Hence when that eternal life is refused they become justly held to be guilty of all the transgressions of the law which they commit.] "So then they that are in the flesh" [in the animal and dying state, and persist in refusing life] "cannot please God." [No matter what they do, so long as they refuse to take the only course that God requires of them, viz., to come to Christ that they may have life. We say, so long as they refuse to do this, it is utterly impossible for them to do anything that is acceptable to God; because, God requires of the sinner, the very first thing he does, to come to Christ for life; and for a soul to think to please God by doing something else, first, is but to insult his Maker.]

The Fire of Gehenna.

The texts which speak of the punishment of the wicked in hell fire, where the worm dieth not and the fire is not quenched, are supposed by some to form an insurmountable objection to the doctrine of the final and utter destruction of the wicked. So far from that being the case, however, we conceive those very texts prove in the most conclusive manner that the wicked are "to be punished with everlasting destruction," so that "they shall be as though they had not been."

The original word in these texts translated hell, is Gehenna; a word, says Dr. Geo. Campbell, that "never occurs in Septuagint Greek, nor in any classic author in the world." It was never employed by our Lord nor any of his apostles in addressing Gentiles—it was confined alone to the Jews—hence we are to look to that source only for the meaning of the phrase.

The word is derived from "Ge," which signifies a "valley," and "Hinnom," a man's name: "The Valley of Hinnom," south of Jerusalem, "once celebrated for the horrid worship of Moloch, and afterwards polluted with every species of filth, as well as the carcasses of animals, and dead bodies of malefactors, to consume which, in order to avert the pestilence which such a mass of corruption would occasion, constant fires were kept burning." —Greek Lexicon.

Whatever was cast into this fire was to be destroyed, not preserved: utterly destroyed. If any flesh should fall outside of the fire the worms devoured it, so that nothing there escaped utter destruction. In the time of our Lord's minstry the Pharisees used these circumstances to denote the punishment of the wicked. Does any one believe that their original design in doing so could be any other than to express an entire extermination of the wicked. We doubt not, at first, that was the only idea that could enter their minds, whatever idea might afterwards have been attached to it by perverted imaginations. We conclude our Lord used the word only in its primary signification, which was that of utter destruction, and not preservation; and we do not see how a Jew could understand him in any other sense. This being the case it is one of the strongest texts in the Bible to disprove the common theory of the eternal preservation of the wicked in undescribable torments. The impenitent and incorrigible sinner, like the filth about Jerusalem, and the dead bodies of animals and men, if not entirely consumed and destroyed, would keep alive the plague in the universe; hence, they shall be "cast into the fire of Gehenna—hell fire;" or be utterly and totally destroyed: therefore, "fear him who is able to destroy both soul and body in gehenna—hell"—Matt. x. 28. Just so certain as the filth about Jerusalem, and dead carcasses were utterly consumed in the burning fire of the Valley of Hinnom, so certainly will God destroy the entire being of the incorrigible sinner, so that the universe shall be clear of these plague spots: then shall be fulfilled that which is written Rev. v. 13, "And every creature which is in heaven, and on the earth, and under the earth, and such as are in the sea, and all that are in them, heard I saying, Blessing and honor, and glory, and power, be unto him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb for ever and ever."

Not a creature shall be left in conscious existence but what shall join in ascriptions of praise to God and the Lamb. Glorious time—happy hour. May you and I, dear reader, be of that happy number. If we would be, let us seek holiness of heart and life; for all others will be utterly destroyed. In Christ alone is life: know him—love him—obey him, and then we shall join the blessed company John heard praising in the strains just described, which may the Lord grant us throngh Jesus Christ our Saviour.

Western Mission.—No. 9.

FROM W. S. CAMPBELL.

Lewistown, Ills., July 24, 1865.

We have closed our Tent meeting at Milton. We have succeded much better than we expected. We had some serious inconveniences in getting up the tent and starting our labors; but the people came out well, listened with attention and interest, and preserved very good order. There was much conviction on the minds of all; whether those who professed faith in Christ, or the unconverted, some of whom became earnestly anxious to understand fully the way of salvation.

We endeavored to present the divine plan as a perfect system; the whole of the truth as it is in Jesus Christ; and never did it seem so beautiful. Many had never heard on this subject sufficiently to form any conception of the true grounds of our hope. The old objections of a community but little enlightened upon our views, were taken up and removed: and thus many persons who had heard that we believed man is nothing but a beast, and had no soul, were enabled to see the scriptural and philosophical platform which we present. And some men of very good understanding are among those who believe. We expect more good will follow. The inquiry into the real Bible position upon man is becoming general. Ignorance of the Bible on the question of immortality has reigned over the hearts of every class—the darkness perfect and entirely unbroken, through the influence of theological dogmas, swallowed down because taught by the authority of the Church, and believed in without the trouble of thinking that a doubt could be raised or different theory could be offered.

It is proverbial, that the people of the West are indolent. I do not thus accuse them; but I find many have been altogether too lazy in the matter of study upon the principles of the gospel, and indeed, lack all learning upon the nature of man. The clergy, no doubt, wish them to remain so. If not, they are completely in the dark, and not only will not inquire themselves, but lead the flock in the same path they have selected. What is the consequence? We are accounted infidels and disturbers of the quiet faith of the elect, who are content to expect that if they comply with the terms dictated by the church, in other words, the decisions of the Ministers, they will, at last, "save" their "never dying souls" in heaven; of which they have as little conception as the ancient heathen. But they could not keep us out of the community! We came, and, as the apostles were accused of doing, have in some sense "turned" things "upside down".

The people are all talking, and wishing we should hold more meetings. The papers and tracts are read with avidity. They are doing a good work. Some are beginning to feel the importance of confessing the truth; and taking the cross of Christ. They wish to feel the justifying power of faith and lead a life of devotion to the cause of our Lord. Many of the members of different sects are much concerned with these things.

There is quite a company present where I am writing. To hear them talk would remind any of our old brethren and sisters, of by-gone days, when we were so earnest to ascertain and promote the truth. The poor blind teachers will not deter these honest souls from the course of Bible reading we recommend and the analysis of the great doctrines we lay in the foundation of the faith, nor from acknowledging the beauty of the superstructure which we raise. They begin to see that there is a "slough" into which both the teacher of the old mythological inculcations of man's existence and destiny, and the passive, unreflecting adherent of his "vain and deceitful philosophy" will tumble, and flounder at last.

It is earnestly requested that we hold a Tent meeting at Totten Prairie, five miles west of here. We have not, at this moment, determined what is duty in the matter: most likely, we shall go.

To have seen the Tent by the side of a beautiful grove, but alone, would not have impressed a stranger with the idea of much of a meeting; but we knew that people lived all over the region, and would come. We could not but feel that our brethren in the East were giving us good christian remembrance, and putting up prayers to God in our behalf.

Services usually commence at 11 o'clock A. M., in this county; hence, owing to the difference in time, the friends East will have gone home from morning service and can engage in prayer for us, especially while we are in the midst of a discourse. Will they do it? To me, this is the Minister's Monday. I labored very hard yesterday, and will need a little recuperation; after which, we will strike some other blows, trusting that God will make them effectual. We have to work on the whole grand scheme—The coming of Christ; His kingdom; the resurrection; immortality; the sleep of the dead; destruction of the wicked; no life out of Christ; justification; judgment; atonement; the reliving, and incorruptibility of the children of God.

And these things, we so urge, that we can call them practical truths. It is then practical preaching, is it not? The seed we are throwing in broadcast; may the great husbandman cause much fruit to come in due time.

P. S. We have determined to hold a meeting at Totten Prairie.

A Stormy-day Reflection.

BY W. S. CAMPBELL.

What are a few personal inconveniences in view of the magnitude of the work to be done? What are the incessant labors which we have to perform, the trials we pass through, the privations which we endure?

Some must always be taking upon themselves the responsibility of the success of a great cause, and its interests must seem, in some sense to depend upon them. But this will apply mainly to such as really love that cause, and consequently are willing to take hold of the work in earnest, which may be found necessary to its promotion.

Such will not be backward to seize and use the laboring oar. They will bear a hand with a will, and manfully contend with opposing elements, overcoming difficulties, removing obstructions, grasping with avidity each favorable moment, and turn that events may take, pressing on to new grounds, embracing every new opening, making every sacrifice; and finally, with dilligence, and perseverance with wisdom and ever enduring strength, be cause of everlasting application.

Such men might naturally become leaders; they would not at the same time be found managers. It is common for this latter class to wait till success already begins to crown the efforts of the patient and faithful laborer, the bold and self-sacrificing pioneer; then, with love of the cause, at least in profession, they will connect themselves with it, patronizingly indorse it, and are ready to adopt measures, propose plans, organize action, and, having attained position, engage in expelling heretics (those who differ on points they judge will become unpopular) and become the dictators of terms to the body. Some will arise who were never known in any good cause, and never would have been, had it not been for the progress of this very work which they now change and nullify, being made the tools of the designing, and sure to be found on the side that would stand still.

Now we are referring to the trial which some have experienced, and are still passing through; we have spoken of the true course of some others, by this hint; and we have at the same time intimated what is, we trust, the steady, constant, onward course of those laborers who have, and will act in the real cause of truth; which will ever advance, and consequently require progressive minds, and the study and labor, with the self-denial which are adapted to so grand a work.

The truth is progressive. The church should take a firm and decided position far in advance of what she has held; then may the bold uncompromising defenders of the gospel be prepared to grapple with error, whether the old and long-fought works of the enemy, or the newer and more subtle position of modern infidelity, which the cunning skepticism of our time has developed. How can the advocate of Bible truth expect to succeed, if he does not and will not employ the light of divine truth which God has caused to develop, that the most palpable infidel conclusions, arising from long established theological premises, may be refuted?

Much of the speculation and skeptical systems of the present day may be traced to long admitted, but unsound position taken on bible points, which the various sects have not waited to question. Shall we by expositions, some of which have been abandoned by others as uuteuable, or by new and unphilosophical as well as unscriptural interpretations, encourage such aberations from the blessed divine plan?

There are men who, "without the hope of fee or reward in this world, still persist in preaching—preaching the word; unpopular doctrines; and have been devoting youth and manhood, and are consecrating their last years to the same noble work, and will trust to God for the result. We, brethren, cannot return to the grounds of doctrine which we have proved unsound, and are as far at least from being acceptable to the bible student as they ever were. We have sacrificed, and we do sacrifice earthly hopes; all expectation of wordly promotion or wealth. Opportunities for honor and ease have been neglected. We have received the commission to "go into the world"—the field; whether it be far or near—East or West. We cannot take this sacrifice from the altar. We must proceed. We are few. We may stand alone. We can, by the grace of God, live and act on the same grand principle of trust, in declaring the advanced views of the glorious revelation of God. Shall we not be found like the "old Guard," who aswered the demand to surrender—"The Guard dies—it never surrenders"?

Then let us consider, whether we are the more public laborers or the members, that the struggle, the battle, the loss of all things, the long journey, to the end, the hope of the sweet response, the expected rest, the constant campaign, the victory, Christ and the kingdom forever are ours. All these will be, must be ours, if we are faithful, even with persecution, "oppositions of science, falsely so called," all the more tenaciously hold from being received at second hand, with perils among the brethren, and every where else. We have need to control our own spirit, to endure hardships as good soldiers, and follow the leader. The sun, betimes, breaks through the clouds; it will dispel their dark shadows; it will clear the sky. The dawn appears beyond the receding gloom of night; the day is surely coming; and the light of life, immortal, shines out upon an eternal day.

Highways and Hedges.

BY ELD. F. H. BURBANK.

It has been remarked, that "one half of the world does not know how the other half live." Being engaged in a missionary work among the degraded of this great city, I have an opportunity of seeing how "the other half live," and pen this article for the readers of the Herald, that they may know something of the scenes of degradation and poverty, of which I have been an eye-witness for several months. At best, I can give you but a feeble description of the state of things, and to many it will seem almost incredible that human beings could be sunken so low in the scale of humanity in a christian land. Even thousands in this city (Philadelphia), are in utter ignorance of the existence in their midst of such awful abodes of crime, filth, and misery.

THE LOCALITY.

The district which has been our "battle ground" is bounded by Pine and Shippen, Fourth and Eighth streets. Gaskill, Lombard, Sixth, Seventh, St. Mary's, and Bedford Sts., within the bounds I have mentioned, together with innumerable courts and alleys, is the field, where a few of us are at work for our Msater, chiefly among the colored population, to persuade them to be reconciled to God. The houses are generally of brick, with the exception of the tenements on Bedford street with its alleys, and literally filled with colored persons, and Irish Catholics. On Gaskill street we find a more respectable class than in the others, yet there is quite a "sprinkling" of "hard cases" to be found there also.

SCENES ON SEVENTH STREET.

On this street are a number of rum shops, some patronized by the blacks, some by the Irish, and others by both classes. We find some "well disposed" families on this street, but many that are exceedingly wicked. I will give a description of one of the "dens of hell" that are found on this street, below South St. Picture to yourselves a low, "two story" wooden house, or block, with the lower windows of ground glass, to let in daylight, and keep off "gazers." We enter one of the doors, and find ourselves in a room twelve feet square, and about eight feet in heigth. In the back part of the room is the counter where liquors are sold. Back of the counter are bottles, jugs, demijohns, kegs, and barrels, filled with "Death." The atmosphere of the room is completely saturated with the fumes of the various "brands," and tobacco. The bar-keeper and ourselves are the only sober persons in the room, for in that apartment we shall see ten, fifteen, and even twenty men and women in a state of beastly intoxication. What a scene! On two sides of the room are benched filled with degraded ones. First in order is a large woman, almost nude, lying upon that hard bench. Her face is cut, and swoolen, her eyes bloodshot, hair matted, and as we look upon her shudderingly, she heaps upon our heads the most awful oaths and curses. We can hardly call her a woman. She resembles more the fierce Tiger or Hyena. All is harsh and forbidding. Next to, and resting upon her, is another woman, then another, then a man, then a woman, then a man, and so on around the room. We look upon the floor, and there behold a spectacle which makes us sick at heart. A dozen men and women are lying there in all kinds of positions, with out regard to sex, or decency. As we look upon them, we are saluted with curses, and the declaration, "I am a Catholic, and mean to die a Catholic." We shudder as we pass across the room among those wicked beings, and leave a few tracts, then leave that place, and visit the next, where the same scenes are repeated.

At the street corners we find the blacks gathered, some with bruised, cut, and swoolen heads; others half clad, barefooted, and repulsive in their appearance. They drink their liquor at the bar, then go home and "have their drunk out." They appear to realize their degraded condition, but are destitute of power to reform. Naught but the grace of God can reach their case.

BEDFORD STREET.

We now come to the "Five Points" of Philadelphia. The scenes we have witnessed have been awful, but now we shall see an accumalation of horrors. God alone knows the entire history of this street with its courts and alleys. Houses of bad repute, rumshops, and eating houses are abundant, especially the two former. A few lovers of Christ are to be found, but there are many desperate characters, who make the street hideous with their oaths, curses, and obscene language. Street fights are common. We think that "Satan's seat" is an appropriate name for this locality.

The houses are chiefly wooden structures, low, rickety, filthy places. All these houses, together with sheds, shanties, and dens, are filled with tenants, black and white, who frequently live in the same house; one party occupying one room, and the other party another. There are an infinite number of "free" tenants who, in order to be removed, bring into service the Apothecary's art, and the waters of the Schuylkill river, but which however, are seldom applied. All kinds of inventions for stoves appear, in the shape of piles of bricks, iron kettles, tin ones, etc., etc.

Once in a while we find a tenement furnished "after a fashion;" a very palace, to what others are. Garrets and Cellars are alike occupied. To get up into the one, we frequently go up dark stairways, with our bodies and limbs in imminent peril on account of large holes, worn through every step. Many of these garrets are destitute of furniture of any kind whatever. The tenants eat from, live on, and sleep on the bare floor. Big holes in the roof let in daylight and air, also rain and snow. In some garrets we can stand erect only where the ridge pole is laid.

We get down into the cellars from the streets or yards, sometimes by means of stone steps, or wooden ones, and sometimes by coarsely built and almost perpendicular ladders, down which we go backwards to insure a safe descent. Scores of damp cellars are occupied by families, some with furniture and bedding, some with neither. The door ways furnish light and air. Some are fortunate enough to get scraps of carpet to lay upon the damp floor. If any of the readers of the Herald are discontented with their own homes, a visit to this locality will produce a radical change, if their cases are not hopeless. Many of the families occupy but one room, garret, or cellar. The greater part of these places are small and poorly ventilated. Some rooms contain eight, ten, and twelve persons, who, living in places begrimmed with smoke and dirt, present a very uninviting appearance.

WHYS AND WHERFORES.

The question is often asked me, "Why are these persons so degraded?" My answer is, rumshops, and pawnshops. It is true that all the misery is not occasioned by them, but the greater part is. Some have been brought to extreme poverty through sickness and other misfortunes. There are others who are lazy, and prefer their present condition, than to work more and be better off. We labor chiefly among those who are deserving of help, and do what we can to lead them and all others to Christ.

LANDLORDS AND RENTS.

Many of these tenements are rented by Irish and other parties, who sub-rent them, and in this way they "increase in riches." These "subs" charge from two to four dollars a month for a single room. In many instances, the rent is paid nightly. If not, "leave" is the peremptory order of the "sub." Some of these tenements are hardly fit for animals to live in, yet these enormous rents are charged, and paid in advance.

THE HARVEST OF DEATH.

From what I have written, the sanitary condition of this localiiy can easily be determined. When we take into the account the condition of the tenements, the filthiness of the tenants, their manner of living, the food they eat, and their want of clothing, we must know that sickness and death must do a fearful work there. I have seen boys and girls, large and small, shoeless, and nearly destitute of clothing, and the men and women in rags. All kinds of fevers, together with Small Pox and Varioloid have prevailed to an alarming extent. Hundreds have died. I have witnessed scenes of horror in these cellars, garrets, and dens. It has caused me to cry, "Lord Jesus, come quickly." With two of our missionaries, I have spent many hours, for weeks and months, in laboring among those distressed ones. Our lives and health were spared, and we expect in the resurrection at the last day, to meet with many, who found peace in Christ before they died.

PAWN SHOPS.

Three gilt balls are to be seen in every square. It is the pawn-broker's sign. Hither the denizens of these localities resort, and pawn clothing, knives, plates, and in fact everything but the rags they have upon them, which would be received by none but rag-pickers. The proceeds are swallowed in the shape of poisoned liquors. I have visited those shops, and seen scores of miserable beings, pawning away articles for about one quarter their value, to the Jews who are the presiding geniuses of these establishments. But few of the articles thus pawned are redeemed, and at stated periods are sold at auction. I have an idea that the brokers and rumsellers are fast friends. They are mutually dependent, and their business is sustained by the ruin of thousands.

EATING HOUSES.

There are eating houses on this street that are sustained, or furnished by the good people of this city. Beggars go out with baskets and pitiful tales, and speedily "load up," then return with the spoils to this locality, where they spread out the bread, bones, and pieces of meat, to tempt the appetites of those who are too poor to buy at regular prices, and too proud to beg. They get a part of a loaf for two or three cents, or a scrap of meat, or cold potatoes. Thus they, the purchasers, live, and thus the eating house keepers live, and finally after accumulating a little property, move into more respectable quarters.

To many, these things will appear incredible; but I know them to be facts. If any one of our readers was to visit these localities with me, he would say, "the half was not told me." I am glad that a better day is dawning, when righteousness shall fill the earth. At some future time I may give some interesting recitals of conversions among these children of crime. From your brother in Christ.

Letters and Extracts.

From Jonathan the Aged.

It is fifty-eight years to day—July 1, 1865, 2 P.M.—since I drew my first spiritual breath. I am now in the eighty-ninth year of my natural life. Strange that my harp should keep in tune so long. Enjoying as good health as sinful mortality can admit of, and at any time ready to quit all for a sleep in Christ or a translation into his kingdom. I feel safe in either case. Amen.

To celebrate my birth-day, I will now lead off from Paul's first letter to the Thesolonians, ch. iv. 13—written fifty-eight years after the birth of Christ. "I would not have you to be ignorant, brethren, concerning them which are asleep, that ye sorrow not as others which have no hope." Namely, Adam and Eve, Cain, and all the old world that was drowned; Sodom that died condemned in their sins, which will live no more. "For if we believe"—a condition—"that Jesus died and rose again, even so them also that sleep in Jesus will God bring with him."—"If any man be in Christ he is a new creature; old things are passed away, behold,"—note of admiration—"all things are become new. And all things are of God, who hath reconciled us to himself." 2 Cor. v.. 17, 18. These are the only characters that ever sleep and awake in Jesus. These will God bring with him, Jesus. From heaven? No; from the dead. Heb. xiii. 20—"For this we say unto you by the word of the Lord, that we which are alive, and remain unto the coming of the Lord, shall not prevent them which are asleep."—Such, Paul says, shall not die, but shall be changed from mortal to immortality. In the twinkling of an eye, changed, and caught up in the clouds of heaven, with those Christians that are raised from the dead, and so are ever with the Lord.—"For the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout,"—shake the earth and heaven also—"with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God; and the dead in Christ shall rise first:"—that is, before the living are changed, to rise to meet their living brethren. What a meeting this will be! They have never seen each other in full-grown immortality before, nor embraced each other in immortal love. Paul says, "Comfort one another with these words."

God is to judge the world; that is, every one of his creation of intelligent beings, on two general principles—Right and Wrong, truth and falsehood, loyalty and unloyalty to the laws of God. The Infinite, Immortal judge is capable of judging motives as well as actions. He knows the end from the beginning, and things that are to come as though they were already past. He is no respecter of persons, but in every nation he that does or would serve God has his name written in the Lamb's book of life. Amen.

JONATHAN WILSON the old Pilgrim.

From Helen Robertson.

UTICA, N. Y., July 23, 1865.

BR. STORRS:—The doctrine of the immortality of the soul, with its baneful consequences, has been on my mind considerable for some time; and reading "Bishop Newton on Future Torment," in the last Herald, has made the doctrine appear like a hydraheaded monster. Many powerful minds as well as his have been thrown into inextricable dilemmas by believing this false doctrine; some ignorantly supposing it is taught in the Scriptures, while others who have found out that it is not, still cling to the doctrine, and reject the bible.

One of the latter class I talked with a few days ago; a minister of rare intelligence and education, who can read the Hebrew and Greek as readily as the English. He said he believed in the immortality of the soul. I asked if he believed the doctrine was taught in the bible? He said, No. How did he get it then? He believed because all men desired it. God had implanted that desire, and he would not have done so had there been no immortality for man. I told him that I too believed that God had implanted that desire in man, and had also made provision for its gratification, but it would be attainable at the resurrection, through Christ, the LIFE-GIVER, and only to those who are connected to him as the branch is to the vine, referring him at the same time to 1 Cor. xv.

Another minister I asked, Did you ever preach a sermon on the soul's immortality? He answered, Yes, once. What was your text? "Having a desire to depart and to be with Christ." Well, that don't teach the immortality. Did you use any other texts of Scripture? Yes, one or two. Do you honestly believe that doctrine is taught in the bible? He very hesitatingly answered, No.

Thus the teachers believe, and the people don't "search the Scriptures" for themselves; consequently, they hardly know what they believe. But truth will stand; thank God for it. Our believing or not believing won't alter that one iota. With God there is neither variableness nor shadow of turning. What a rock is this for the Christian heart to rest upon!

Don't let any of us say, We have all the truth and none else have it. These are the ones that are most apt to be wrong. But do let us have love one to another; that charity that suffereth long and is kind. "For now we see through a glass darkly; then face to face: now I know in part; but then shall I know even as also I am known. And now abideth faith, hope, charity; these three; but the greatest of these is charity."

Many of God's own children differ very widely on doctrinal points; but let us remember to follow peace with all men, and holiness, without which no man shall see the Lord.

From Wm. Lucas.

PEEKSKILL, N. Y., July 23, 1865.

This evening ended one of the most singular meetings I have ever seen. The meeting it seems was started by a colored woman; it was called a Convention for the purpose of founding an African Female Mission. This Convention was held a full week; most of the time on a hill in the eastern part of this village, one of the most lovely spots to be found among the rocks and trees, and in full view of Peekskill bay on the Hudson river.

We had preaching four, five, and six times a day in the woods, and in the evening they withdrew to a small hall in the centre of the village and there carried on their meetings nearly all night long. There was much, to be sure, of what some call the ludicrous, but even that seemed to call out the white population, and many with white faces seemed to be profited. This Convention was not carried on by the learned and rich. The preachers were three or four colored women and two white women, all of Philadelphia; and one afternoon our old friend Samuel Curry, of New York, said some good things to us; to me they always seem good when they come from him. There were none of our preachers in this place that came up to see or help these weak females; and what is the best of it, they or we did not want them.

It was truly surprising to see some of these colored women, from sixty to seventy-five years of age, stand up, without education, and preach Christ and the resurrection for an hour and a half without stopping. There were some who condemned the two white women for mixing in with the blacks; and talked a little about tar and feathers; but they had many friends among us, and I do not wish to condemn them. I hope they do really enjoy what they appeared to.

Our young men, God bless them, as a whole, behaved well; and I am heartily glad that they did get some good preaching. They had a Love-feast which ended the meeting in the woods; and as to talk about mixing, and tar and feathers, why, it did not seem as if they thought of either; and it really looked good to see the old colored women hand around the bread and water to the whites, in place of sitting back in the last seat and partaking last. There was much said that did not agree with my views; but it was preaching from the lowly, and I was pleased and profited, and say, God bless them.

From Mrs. N. M. Henry.

BUNKER HILL, ILLS, July 22, 1865.

BR STORRS.—Once more, by the goodness of God, I am permitted to take my pen, to talk to you and your readers, but with poor white trembling fingers. My severe illness of last winter in Iowa, and distressing sickness of the past few weeks, when the "death Angel" seemed hovering about, to consign me to a home with the slumbering millions, have left me very feeble.

Speaking of Iowa, makes me think of Br. T. W. Smith's horse. I am so glad the good Lord put it in your kind heart to get him that horse; it is indeed a great kindness to him. I was in his little home last winter, of one room, neat and snug, it was too, in every corner; kept so by his good little wife. I had a taste of traveling over those prairies, lovely in their summer beauty, but terrible in winter. Think of going fifteen or twenty miles without a solitary house. If ever any one needed a horse, Br. Smith did, and a buggy for summer and sleigh for winter.

You preachers of the cities, and the East generally, know nothing of the hardships of us, western missionaries. Alone and unprotected, save by God and the "good angels." I have been as far west as Fort Dodge; and then the calls came from still farther, Fort Randal, Spirit Lake, &c. &c.; not from "believers," either; but from people hungry for the Bible; and I am not sent off with a "God bless you; come again," only; but the blessings are accompanied with the "needful" and the "come again," too. There are noble hearts in Iowa; and I find them every where. But says one, "Why don't your husband go with you? it would look so much better." For the same reason that Noah did not go from the Ark with his dove; because he could not. But Noah's dove went and returned safe. So have I. Noah's dove was trusted; so am I. Noah's dove brought the Olive branch, and good tidings. Please God, so will I. I do not need him for a protector. God does that; and he is needed at home to work for an honest living, to take care of the old Father and Mother, and Children.

But whether I leave the sheltering Ark again, to preach, seems at present very doubtful. The pain in my side, cough, night-chills, with my other complaints, makes the future look dark.

I have been advised to go to the St. Anthony's "House" at the Falls of that name, Minn. I should indeed be glad to go, but where is the means? You say, "knock on the dear Lord," and the money will come. But if I should ask assistance of my many friends, that man, (or some other man or woman,) that called me "a beggar," to my face, at Wilbraham, last summer, he would jump up horrified at my audacity. Yet a little now from each would probably save a life. Those that know me, know its worth. I want to go once more into the "harvest field" to gather "sheaves." Shall I be helped to regain my strength that I may? Our circumstances are such that it is utterly impossible for me to go to the Hygenian Cure without assistance. If I can go, I want tracts to scatter; as it is my way to sow the seed by all waters.

To Sister L. J. B. 2 Pet. ii. and Jude, are the same class, viz., Modern Spiritualists. The "unjust" who are "reserved unto the day of judgment," are the "Angels which kept not their first estate;" not wicked dead, as some say; but are the demons cast down to Tartarus, in chains under darkness unto the day of judgment, &c.

Who are the Angels that sinned? Ans. The "Sons of God" that saw the daughters of men &c. Gen. vi. They despised the government of Heaven; and they teach it in these "last days." They (the Sons of God) practised "Free Loveism" in those days. They teach it now. They spake evil of things that they understand not, (that is, salvation by the blood of Christ), "denying the Lord that bought them," (by his blood).

Said one of their great ones to me, at one time, Mrs. Henry upon whom do you depend for salvation? Upon Jesus Christ, Sir, if I am ever saved. I shall never forget the look of contempt and derision that passed over his face as he replied, in tones that chilled my blood, "I pity you, if you depend for salvation upon the old, rotten, stinking body, BLOOD and bones of that JESUS CHRIST." Was not that "denying the Lord that bought him," truly? That man was once a Methodist preacher. "These be they, (the last day mockers) sensual, having not the Spirit:" "Anti-Christ."

A word or two about eternal fire, and I've done. Eternity is simply the name of God's habitation; or, in other words, "the high and lofty place," or set dwelling. The word eternity, has no reference to time, whatever. Consequently "eternal fire" is fire that comes from "eternity." We say, "French goods." Why? They come from, or are manufactured in France. Do you get my meaning? It is an idea of my own, but looks, to me at least, sensible, and clears up all the mystery about "eternal fire." But I am so weary I will close by saying, Br. W. S. Campbell, write to us. Our address is still, Bunker Hill, Ill., Box 97.

LA FAYETTE NORRIS, Campton, Iowa, writes:—My friend Dr. Louden, I see is writing for your paper. This will furnish a good chance to spread the truth in this vicinity. I wish you would send me seven copies each of the numbers containing his articles and the replies. I have had several friendly interviews with the Doctor, who is a Preacher in the Protestant Methodist Church. He lives but two miles from me. He seems very candid, and has read some of your works. The Preacher whose sermon I reviewed has borrowed one of your Examiners on purpose to fight the doctrine. Of this I have pretty good evidence. I hope no Preacher of life through Christ will go through on the Dubuque and Sioux City R. R., without giving me a call.

REMARKS BY THE EDITOR.—We have not a copy left of the No, June 14, containing Dr. Louden's first article. We will send you the desired number, hereafter, if we can spare them. Let the Preacher who has borrowed the Examiner to find weapons to "fight" us, borrow more and read them thoroughly. He will not be the first that has tried a similiar course and found himselt disarmed. The main thing wanting, to an honest mind, is thorough examination of the whole subject. As soon as old prejudices give way the case is hopeful, if the person is not at once converted. The time has come that the old theory of immortality, and hopeless suffering in another life, must give way, or its advocates be overwhelmed by the swelling floods of "Spiritualism," which is the offspring of inherent immortality. But the Spirit of God is lifting up a standard against that abomination; and its proud waves foam in vain against "NO LIFE OUT OF CHRIST."

Obituary.

Fell asleep in Jesus, near the village of Decatur, Mich., May 20, 1865, WM. DUTTON, aged seventy-nine years.

Father Dutton was formerly of Castle, Vt., who was one among the first that embraced the doctrine of the second personal coming of our blessed Lord in that vicinity, and ever since then, down to the close of his last day with us, has been a devoted and an exemplary christian always, and under all circumstances evinced a devotional spirit. He left an aged widow of the same faith, and a large number of relatives and friends to lament his loss.

SIX SERMONS on the inquiry, Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the Life-giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by GEO. STORRS; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This word contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in plain binding, 50 cents; in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near ten years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER: OR, MAN IN DEATH; AND THE HOPE FOR A FUTURE LIFE.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead, can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none there fore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD; OR, THE RIGHTEOUS ONLY WILL LIVE AGAIN. By GEO. STORRS. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the EDITOR of the HERALD OF LIFE. Price, $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.—IMMORTALITY: The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev, T. M. POST, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by GEO. STORRS. Price in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. POST, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a Prize Essay on IMMORTALITY, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men, without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

DR. POST took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The REVIEWER followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The Author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

BIBLE VS. TRADITION: in which the True Teaching of the Bible is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity Life, Death, &c. Price, bound, $1. Postage 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. It is a work of much labor and research. The title indicates its object, and the performance shows the object was kept in view throughout. The language is sometimes severe on what is called "orthodoxy—more so than is desirable—but the value of the work, in general, cannot be over-estimated. Thousands of it have been sent abroad, and thousand more ought to be scattered. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subjects; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

Highways and Hedges.

BY ELD. F. H. BURBANK.

It has been remarked, that "one half of the world does not know how the other half live." Being engaged in a missionary work among the degraded of this great city, I have an opportunity of seeing how "the other half live," and pen this article for the readers of the Herald, that they may know something of the scenes of degradation and poverty, of which I have been an eye-witness for several months. At best, I can give you but a feeble description of the state of things, and to many it will seem almost incredible that human beings could be sunken so low in the scale of humanity in a christian land. Even thousands in this city (Philadelphia), are in utter ignorance of the existence in their midst of such awful abodes of crime, filth, and misery.

THE LOCALITY.

The district which has been our "battle ground" is bounded by Pine and Shippen, Fourth and Eighth streets. Gaskill, Lombard, Sixth, Seventh, St. Mary's, and Bedford Sts., within the bounds I have mentioned, together with innumerable courts and alleys, is the field, where a few of us are at work for our Msater, chiefly among the colored population, to persuade them to be reconciled to God. The houses are generally of brick, with the exception of the tenements on Bedford street with its alleys, and literally filled with colored persons, and Irish Catholics. On Gaskill street we find a more respectable class than in the others, yet there is quite a "sprinkling" of "hard cases" to be found there also.

SCENES ON SEVENTH STREET.

On this street are a number of rum shops, some patronized by the blacks, some by the Irish, and others by both classes. We find some "well disposed" families on this street, but many that are exceedingly wicked. I will give a description of one of the "dens of hell" that are found on this street, below South St. Picture to yourselves a low, "two story" wooden house, or block, with the lower windows of ground glass, to let in daylight, and keep off "gazers." We enter one of the doors, and find ourselves in a room twelve feet square, and about eight feet in heigth. In the back part of the room is the counter where liquors are sold. Back of the counter are bottles, jugs, demijohns, kegs, and barrels, filled with "Death." The atmosphere of the room is completely saturated with the fumes of the various "brands," and tobacco. The bar-keeper and ourselves are the only sober persons in the room, for in that apartment we shall see ten, fifteen, and even twenty men and women in a state of beastly intoxication. What a scene! On two sides of the room are benched filled with degraded ones. First in order is a large woman, almost nude, lying upon that hard bench. Her face is cut, and swoolen, her eyes bloodshot, hair matted, and as we look upon her shudderingly, she heaps upon our heads the most awful oaths and curses. We can hardly call her a woman. She resembles more the fierce Tiger or Hyena. All is harsh and forbidding. Next to, and resting upon her, is another woman, then another, then a man, then a woman, then a man, and so on around the room. We look upon the floor, and there behold a spectacle which makes us sick at heart. A dozen men and women are lying there in all kinds of positions, with out regard to sex, or decency. As we look upon them, we are saluted with curses, and the declaration, "I am a Catholic, and mean to die a Catholic." We shudder as we pass across the room among those wicked beings, and leave a few tracts, then leave that place, and visit the next, where the same scenes are repeated.

At the street corners we find the blacks gathered, some with bruised, cut, and swoolen heads; others half clad, barefooted, and repulsive in their appearance. They drink their liquor at the bar, then go home and "have their drunk out." They appear to realize their degraded condition, but are destitute of power to reform. Naught but the grace of God can reach their case.

BEDFORD STREET.

We now come to the "Five Points" of Philadelphia. The scenes we have witnessed have been awful, but now we shall see an accumalation of horrors. God alone knows the entire history of this street with its courts and alleys. Houses of bad repute, rumshops, and eating houses are abundant, especially the two former. A few lovers of Christ are to be found, but there are many desperate characters, who make the street hideous with their oaths, curses, and obscene language. Street fights are common. We think that "Satan's seat" is an appropriate name for this locality.

The houses are chiefly wooden structures, low, rickety, filthy places. All these houses, together with sheds, shanties, and dens, are filled with tenants, black and white, who frequently live in the same house; one party occupying one room, and the other party another. There are an infinite number of "free" tenants who, in order to be removed, bring into service the Apothecary's art, and the waters of the Schuylkill river, but which however, are seldom applied. All kinds of inventions for stoves appear, in the shape of piles of bricks, iron kettles, tin ones, etc., etc. Once in a while we find a tenement furnished "after a fashion;" a very palace, to what others are. Garrets and Cellars are alike occupied. To get up into the one, we frequently go up dark stairways, with our bodies and limbs in imminent peril on account of large holes, worn through every step. Many of these garrets are destitute of furniture of any kind whatever. The tenants eat from, live on, and sleep on the bare floor. Big holes in the roof let in daylight and air, also rain and snow. In some garrets we can stand erect only where the ridge pole is laid.

We get down into the cellars from the streets or yards, sometimes by means of stone steps, or wooden ones, and sometimes by coarsely built and almost perpendicular ladders, down which we go backwards to insure a safe descent. Scores of damp cellars are occupied by families, some with furniture and bedding, some with neither. The door ways furnish light and air. Some are fortunate enough to get scraps of carpet to lay upon the damp floor. If any of the readers of the Herald are discontented with their own homes, a visit to this locality will produce a radical change, if their cases are not hopeless. Many of the families occupy but one room, garret, or cellar. The greater part of these places are small and poorly ventilated. Some rooms contain eight, ten, and twelve persons, who, living in places begrimmed with smoke and dirt, present a very uninviting appearance.

WHYS AND WHERFORES.

The question is often asked me, "Why are these persons so degraded?" My answer is, rumshops, and pawnshops. It is true that all the misery is not occasioned by them, but the greater part is. Some have been brought to extreme poverty through sickness and other misfortunes. There are others who are lazy, and prefer their present condition, than to work more and be better off. We labor chiefly among those who are deserving of help, and do what we can to lead them and all others to Christ.

LANDLORDS AND RENTS.

Many of these tenements are rented by Irish and other parties, who sub-rent them, and in this way they "increase in riches." These "subs" charge from two to four dollars a month for a single room. In many instances, the rent is paid nightly. If not, "leave" is the peremptory order of the "sub." Some of these tenements are hardly fit for animals to live in, yet these enormous rents are charged, and paid in advance.

THE HARVEST OF DEATH.

From what I have written, the sanitary condition of this localiiy can easily be determined. When we take into the account the condition of the tenements, the filthiness of the tenants, their manner of living, the food they eat, and their want of clothing, we must know that sickness and death must do a fearful work there. I have seen boys and girls, large and small, shoeless, and nearly destitute of clothing, and the men and women in rags. All kinds of fevers, together with Small Pox and Varioloid have prevailed to an alarming extent. Hundreds have died. I have witnessed scenes of horror in these cellars, garrets, and dens. It has caused me to cry, "Lord Jesus, come quickly." With two of our missionaries, I have spent many hours, for weeks and months, in laboring among those distressed ones. Our lives and health were spared, and we expect in the resurrection at the last day, to meet with many, who found peace in Christ before they died.

PAWN SHOPS.

Three gilt balls are to be seen in every square. It is the pawn-broker's sign. Hither the denizens of these localities resort, and pawn clothing, knives, plates, and in fact everything but the rags they have upon them, which would be received by none but rag-pickers. The proceeds are swallowed in the shape of poisoned liquors. I have visited those shops, and seen scores of miserable beings, pawning away articles for about one quarter their value, to the Jews who are the presiding geniuses of these establishments. But few of the articles thus pawned are redeemed, and at stated periods are sold at auction. I have an idea that the brokers and rumsellers are fast friends. They are mutually dependent, and their business is sustained by the ruin of thousands.

EATING HOUSES.

There are eating houses on this street that are sustained, or furnished by the good people of this city. Beggars go out with baskets and pitiful tales, and speedily "load up," then return with the spoils to this locality, where they spread out the bread, bones, and pieces of meat, to tempt the appetites of those who are too poor to buy at regular prices, and too proud to beg. They get a part of a loaf for two or three cents, or a scrap of meat, or cold potatoes. Thus they, the purchasers, live, and thus the eating house keepers live, and finally after accumulating a little property, move into more respectable quarters.

To many, these things will appear incredible; but I know them to be facts. If any one of our readers was to visit these localities with me, he would say, "the half was not told me." I am glad that a better day is dawning, when righteousness shall fill the earth. At some future time I may give some interesting recitals of conversions among these children of crime. From your brother in Christ.

Letters and Extracts.

From Jonathan the Aged.

It is fifty-eight years to day—July 1, 1865, 2 P. M.—since I drew my first spiritual breath. I am now in the eighty-ninth year of my natural life. Strange that my harp should keep in tune so long. Enjoying as good health as sinful mortality can admit of, and at any time ready to quit all for a sleep in Christ or a translation into his kingdom. I feel safe in either case. Amen.

To celebrate my birth-day, I will now lead off from Paul's first letter to the Thesolonians, ch. iv. 13—written fifty-eight years after the birth of Christ. "I would not have you to be ignorant, brethren, concerning them which are asleep, that ye sorrow not as others which have no hope." Namely, Adam and Eve, Cain, and all the old world that was drowned; Sodom that died condemned in their sins, which will live no more. "For if we believe"—a condition—"that Jesus died and rose again, even so them also that sleep in Jesus will God bring with him."—"If any man be in Christ he is a new creature; old things are passed away, behold,"—note of admiration—"all things are become new. And all things are of God, who hath reconciled us to himself." 2 Cor. v. 17, 18. These are the only characters that ever sleep and awake in Jesus. These will God bring with him, Jesus. From heaven? No; from the dead. Heb. xiii. 20—"For this we say unto you by the word of the Lord, that we which are alive, and remain unto the coming of the Lord, shall not prevent them which are asleep."—Such, Paul says, shall not die, but shall be changed from mortal to immortality. In the twinkling of an eye, changed, and caught up in the clouds of heaven, with those Christians that are raised from the dead, and so are ever with the Lord.—"For the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout,"—shake the earth and heaven also—"with the voice of the arch-angel, and with the trump of God; and the dead in Christ shall rise first:"—that is, before the living are changed, to rise to meet their living brethren. What a meeting this will be! They have never seen each other in full-grown immortality before, nor embraced each other in immortal love. Paul says, "Comfort one another with these words."

God is to judge the world; that is, every one of his creation of intelligent beings, on two general principles—Right and Wrong, truth and falsehood, loyalty and unloyalty to the laws of God. The Infinite, Immortal judge is capable of judging motives, as well as actions. He knows the end from the beginning, and things that are to come as though they were already past. He is no respecter of persons, but in every nation he that does or would serve God has his name written in the Lamb's book of life. Amen.

JONATHAN WILSON the old Pilgrim.

From Helen Robertson.

UTICA, N. Y., July 23, 1865.

BR. STORRS:—The doctrine of the immortality of the soul, with its baneful consequences, has been on my mind considerable for some time; and reading "Bishop Newton on Future Torment," in the last Herald, has made the doctrine appear like a hydraheaded monster. Many powerful minds as well as his have been thrown into inextricable dilemmas by believing this false doctrine; some ignorantly supposing it is taught in the Scriptures, while others who have found out that it is not, still cling to the doctrine, and reject the bible.

One of the latter class I talked with a few days ago; a minister of rare intelligence and education, who can read the Hebrew and Greek as readily as the English. He said he believed in the immortality of the soul. I asked if he believed the doctrine was taught in the bible? He said, No. How did he get it then? He believed because all men desired it. God had implanted that desire, and he would not have done so had there been no immortality for man. I told him that I too believed that God had implanted that desire in man, and had also made provision for its gratification, but it would be attainable at the resurrection, through Christ, the LIFE-GIVER, and only to those who are connected to him as the branch is to the vine, referring him at the same time to 1 Cor. xv.

Another minister I asked, Did you ever preach a sermon on the soul's immortality? He answered, Yes, once. What was your text? "Having a desire to depart and to be with Christ." Well, that don't teach the immortality. Did you use any other texts of Scripture? Yes, one or two. Do you honestly believe that doctrine is taught in the bible? He very hesitatingly answered, No.

Thus the teachers believe, and the people don't "search the Scriptures" for themselves; consequently, they hardly know what they believe. But truth will stand; thank God for it. Our believing or not believing won't alter that one iota. With God there is neither variableness nor shadow of turning. What a rock is this for the Christian heart to rest upon!

Don't let any of us say, We have all the truth and none else have it. These are the ones that are most apt to be wrong. But do let us have love one to another; that charity that suffereth long and is kind. "For now we see through a glass darkly; then face to face: now I know in part; but then shall I know even as also I am known. And now abideth faith, hope, charity; these three; but the greatest of these is charity."

Many of God's own children differ very widely on doctrinal points; but let us remember to follow peace with all men, and holiness, without which no man shall see the Lord.

From Wm. Lucas.

PEEKSKILL, N. Y., July 23, 1865.

This evening ended one of the most singular meetings I have ever seen. The meeting it seems was started by a colored woman; it was called a Convention for the purpose of founding an African Female Mission. This Convention was held a full week; most of the time on a hill in the eastern part of this village, one of the most lovely spots to be found among the rocks and trees, and in full view of Peekskill bay on the Hudson river.

We had preaching four, five, and six times a day in the woods, and in the evening they withdrew to a small hall in the centre of the village and there carried on their meetings nearly all night long. There was much, to be sure, of what some call the ludicrous, but even that seemed to call out the white population, and many with white faces seemed to be profited. This Convention was not carried on by the learned and rich. The preachers were three or four colored women and two white women, all of Philadelphia; and one afternoon our old friend Samuel Curry, of New York, said some good things to us; to me they always seem good when they come from him. There were none of our preachers in this place that came up to see or help these weak females; and what is the best of it, they or we did not want them.

It was truly surprising to see some of these colored women, from sixty to seventy-five years of age, stand up, without education, and preach Christ and the resurrection for an hour and a half without stopping. There were some who condemned the two white women for mixing in with the blacks; and talked a little about tar and feathers; but they had many friends among us, and I do not wish to condemn them. I hope they do really enjoy what they appeared to.

Our young men, God bless them, as a whole, behaved well; and I am heartily glad that they did get some good preaching. They had a Love-feast which ended the meeting in the woods; and as to talk about mixing, and tar and feathers, why, it did not seem as if they thought of either; and it really looked good to see the old colored women hand around the bread and water to the whites, in place of sitting back in the last seat and partaking last. There was much said that did not agree with my views; but it was preaching from the lowly, and I was pleased and profited, and say, God bless them.

From Mrs. N. M. Henry.

BUNKER HILL, ILLS., July 22, 1865.

BR STORRS.—Once more, by the goodness of God, I am permitted to take my pen, to talk to you and your readers, but with poor white trembling fingers. My severe illness of last winter in Iowa, and distressing sickness of the past few weeks, when the "death Angel" seemed hovering about, to consign me to a home with the slumbering millions, have left me very feeble.

Speaking of Iowa, makes me think of Br. T. W. Smith's horse. I am so glad the good Lord put it in your kind heart to get him that horse; it is indeed a great kindness to him. I was in his little home last winter, of one room, neat and snug, it was too, in every corner; kept so by his good little wife. I had a taste of traveling over those prairies, lovely in their summer beauty, but terrible in winter. Think of going fifteen or twenty miles without a solitary house. If ever any one needed a horse, Br. Smith did, and a buggy for summer and sleigh for winter.

You preachers of the cities, and the East generally, know nothing of the hardships of us, western missionaries. Alone and unprotected, save by God and the "good angels." I have been as far west as Fort Dodge; and then the calls came from still farther, Fort Randal, Spirit Lake, &c. &c.; not from "believers," either; but from people hungry for the Bible; and I am not sent off with a "God bless you; come again," only; but the blessings are accompanied with the "needful" and the "come again," too. There are noble hearts in Iowa; and I find them every where. But says one, "Why don't your husband go with you? it would look so much better." For the same reason that Noah did not go from the Ark with his dove; because he could not. But Noah's dove went and returned safe. So have I. Noah's dove was trusted; so am I. Noah's dove brought the Olive branch, and good tidings. Please God, so will I. I do not need him for a protector. God does that; and he is needed at home to work for an honest living, to take care of the old Father and Mother, and Children.

But whether I leave the sheltering Ark again, to preach, seems at present very doubtful. The pain in my side, cough, night-chills, with my other complaints, makes the future look dark.

I have been advised to go to the St. Anthony's "House" at the Falls of that name, Minn. I should indeed be glad to go, but where is the means? You say, "knock on the dear Lord," and the money will come. But if I should ask assistance of my many friends, that man, (or some other man or woman,) that called me "a beggar," to my face, at Wilbraham, last summer, he would jump up horrified at my audacity. Yet a little now from each would probably save a life. Those that know me, know its worth. I want to go once more into the "harvest field" to gather "sheaves." Shall I be helped to regain my strength that I may? Our circumstances are such that it is utterly impossible for me to go to the Hygenian Cure without assistance. If I can go, I want tracts to scatter; as it is my way to sow the seed by all waters.

To Sister L. J. B. 2 Pet. ii. and Jude, are the same, class, viz., Modern Spiritualists. The "unjust" who are "reserved unto the day of judgment," are the "Angels which kept not their first estate;" not wicked dead, as some say; but are the demons cast down to Tartarus, in chains under darkness unto the day of judgment, &c.

Who are the Angels that sinned? Ans. The "Sons of God" that saw the daughters of men &c. Gen. vi. They despised the government of Heaven; and they teach it in these "last days." They (the Sons of God) practised "Free Loveism" in those days. They teach it now. They spake evil of things that they understand not, (that is, salvation by the blood of Christ), "denying the Lord that bought them," (by his blood).

Said one of their great ones to me, at one time, Mrs. Henry upon whom do you depend for salvation? Upon Jesus Christ, Sir, if I am ever saved. I shall never forget the look of contempt and derision that passed over his face as he replied, in tones that chilled my blood, "I pity you, if you depend for salvation upon the old, rotten, stinking body, BLOOD and bones of that JESUS CHRIST." Was not that "denying the Lord that bought him," truly? That man was once a Methodist preacher. "These be they, (the last day mockers) sensual, having not the Spirit:" "Anti-Christ."

A word or two about eternal fire, and I've done. Eternity is simply the name of God's habitation; or, in other words, "the high and lofty place," or set dwelling. The word eternity, has no reference to time, whatever. Consequently "eternal fire" is fire that comes from "eternity." We say, "French goods." Why? They come from, or are manufactured in France. Do you get my meaning? It is an idea of my own, but looks, to me at least, sensible, and clears up all the mystery about "eternal fire." But I am so weary I will close by saying, Br. W. S. Campbell, write to us. Our address is still, Bunker Hill, Ill., Box 97.

LA FAYETTE NORRIS, Campton; Iowa, writes:—My friend Dr. Louden, I see is writing for your paper. This will furnish a good chance to spread the truth in this vicinity. I wish you would send me seven copies each of the numbers containing his articles and the replies. I have had several friendly interviews with the Doctor, who is a Preacher in the Protestant Methodist Church. He lives but two miles from me. He seems very candid, and has read some of your works. The Preacher whose sermon I reviewed has borrowed one of your Examiners on purpose to fight the doctrine. Of this I have pretty good evidence. I hope no Preacher of life through Christ will go through on the Dubuque and Sioux City R. R., without giving me a call.

REMARKS BY THE EDITOR.—We have not a copy left of the No, June 14, containing Dr. Louden's first article. We will send you the desired number, hereafter, if we can spare them. Let the Preacher who has borrowed the Examiner to find weapons to "fight" us, borrow more and read them thoroughly. He will not be the first that has tried a similiar course and found himself disarmed. The main thing wanting, to an honest mind, is thorough examination of the whole subject. As soon as old prejudices give way the case is hopeful, if the person is not at once converted. The time has come that the old theory of immortality, and hopeless suffering in another life, must give way, or its advocates be overwhelmed by the swelling floods of "Spiritualism," which is the offspring of inherent immortality. But the Spirit of God is lifting up a standard against that abomination; and its proud waves foam in vain against "NO LIFE OUT OF CHRIST."

Obituary.

Fell asleep in Jesus, near the village of Decatur, Mich., May 20, 1865, WM. DUTTON, aged seventy-nine years.

Father Dutton was formerly of Castle, Vt., who was one among the first that embraced the doctrine of the second personal coming of our blessed Lord in that vicinity, and ever since then, down to the close of his last day with us, has been a devoted and an exemplary christian always, and under all circumstances evinced a devotional spirit. He left an aged widow of the same faith, and a large number of relatives and friends to lament his loss.

SIX SERMONS on the inquiry, Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the Life-giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by GEO. STORRS; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This word contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in plain binding, 50 cents; in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near ten years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER: OR, MAN IN DEATH; AND THE HOPE FOR A FUTURE LIFE.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead, can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD; OR, THE RIGHTEOUS ONLY WILL LIVE AGAIN. By GEO. STORRS. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the EDITOR of the HERALD OF LIFE. Price, $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.—IMMORTALITY: The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev, T. M. POST, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by GEO. STORRS. Price in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. POST, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a Prize Essay on IMMORTALITY, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men, with ut egard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

DR. POST took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The REVIEWER followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The Author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

BIBLE VS. TRADITION: in which the True Teaching of the Bible is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity Life, Death, &c. Price, bound, $1. Postage 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. It is a work of much labor and research. The title indicates its object, and the performance shows the object was kept in view throughout. The language is sometimes severe on what is called "orthodoxy—more so than is desirable—but the value of the work, in general, cannot be over-estimated. Thousands of it have been sent abroad, and thousand more ought to be scattered. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subjects; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

GOD'S WAYS NOT OUR WAYS.

Were I the sun—What then, my child?
  Were you the sun,—what then?
I ne'er would shine so warm and mild
  Upon such wicked men.
I'd wither up their budding grain
  Just when it leaves the earth,
And they might sow their seed in vain:—
For never, never would I deign
  To warm it into birth.

Were I the rain—What then, my child?
  Were you the rain,—what then?
I ne'er would fall so still and mild
  Upon such wicked men.
I'd drench their fields till not a root
  Could find a place to cling;
And every young and tender shoot
Should float before the careless foot—
  A drenched and worthless thing.

Were I the wind—What then, my child?
  Were you the wind,—what then?
I ne'er would breathe so soft and mild
  Upon such wicked men.
I'd sweep with wild and fearful blast—
  More fierce than rain or sun—
Their fruitful trees should be o'ercast,
And all their toil and labor past,
  Should be at once undone.

Not so, my child, doth God bestow
  His blessings on mankind:
He treats alike both friend and foe,
  His love is unconfined.
He sends his rain upon the just
  And on the unjust too:
The wicked in his love may trust
Nor are they from his bounties thrust,
  For all the wrong they do.

THE BIBLE IN THE FOOTSTOOL.

There was a family in France, long, long ago, who had a footstool of which they took particular care, and which they used in a singular manner. When strangers were present, the footstool was set aside in some out of the way place, where it would not attract attention; but when the family were alone, it was sure to be brought into notice again. Sometimes the father would take it on his knee, and, turning it upside down, bend over it with the deepest interest. Sometimes it was the mother who held it on her lap, and gazed at it as tenderly as if it were her youngest babe.

What was there about that footstool that made it so precious?

Under the footstool a book was fastened, where it was out of sight, and yet its pages could be turned, and it could be read from beginning to end.

This book was the treasure and comfort of the family. It told them of a friend who was near them at all times, and who was able and willing to save them in every danger. It told them of a beautiful land where sin and sorrow cannot come, and where there shall be no more sickness, and no more death. It taught them how to act at all times and in all circumstances. It gave them comfort in every trouble, and cheered them in the hours of the greatest misfortune. More than all this, it told them of a Saviour, for whose sake the sinner may be forgiven, and received into an eternal home of joy.

I hardly need to tell you the name of this book, for the Bible alone contains such good news, such words of comfort and gladness. But why was this precious book kept in such a strange hiding-place? Why was it read secretly and with trembling?

Alas! in that day the Bible was a forbidden book in France; and those who dared to read it were threatened with punishment, and even with death.

That French family loved their country and their home; but there was something which they loved better—that was, liberty to read God's book openly, and to worship him truly. —Selected by AUNT NELLIE.

"NOT YET."

"Not yet," said the little boy, as he was busy with his trap and ball. "When I grow older I will think about religion."

The little boy grew to be a young man.

"Not yet," said the young man. "I am about to enter into trade. When I see my business prosper, then I shall have more time than now."

Business did prosper.

"Not yet," said the man of business. "My children must have my care. When they are settled in life, I shall be better able to attend to religion."

He lived to be a gray-headed old man.

"Not yet," still he cried. "I shall soon retire from trade, and then I shall have nothing else to do but to read and pray."

And so he died. He put off to another time what should have been done when a child. He lived without God and died without hope.

Dear children, seek Jesus now, while you are a child, or you never may, even if you live long.

A FACT FOR LITTLE BOYS.

In one of the agricultural counties of this country a very rich gentleman lived, and occupied a mansion, with all, or nearly all, the land in the parish. But he had one very bad fault—he was very passionate; and when riding about his farm, if he saw anything contrary to his wish, he would swear very badly; so that his wife was very unhappy, and used to tremble when he came home, lest he should be in a passion. After harvest a poor little boy, who used to go out in the field attending the pigs, one day made a mistake and took his pigs into the wrong field. After a time his master as usual on his rounds, went into the field, and began to swear at the little boy for taking his pigs into the wrong field, and sitting on his horse, was about to flog him with his whip; when the poor lad, looking steadily at his master, said: "Pray sir, do not swear at me so; I will do anything you wish me, but do not swear so, for I cannot bear it!" The simplicity in which the words were spoken so struck the master that he saw his sin, and from that time left off swearing. When he came home he called his children, and told them, that if he ever heard any one of them use bad words he would severely punish them. From that day the wife was cheerful and happy, as her husband no longer used profane language, but always returned home with a smile and kind words. To mark her estimation of the good boy's conduct, she gave him a new suit of clothes.

Boys, beware of anger and improper words. Take care of your lips and your temper. Even rude words are displeasing to God.

THE NEGRO HATING SPIRIT.

We regret to learn that the spirit of negro hatred, which is so full of the venom of satan, has developed itself in Tenn., by burning the Chapel of the Missionaries sent there by the "Freedmen's Mission" under the auspices of the friends of the Advent Herald, Boston, Mass.

The following is the account of this satanic work, given by the Missionaries in the last Advent Herald. We hope and trust God will overrule this manifestation of negro hating malice to the crushing out of this virus of the slaveholding spirit which has so long cursed this land. It is the same spirit that murdered ABRAHAM LINCOLN, and would murder every friend of the colored race, if not restrained by "God's Ministers" (Civil Rulers), who are to "execute wrath upon him that doeth evil."

EDGEFIELD, NEAR NASHVILLE,
July, 13, 1865.

Dear Friends of the Freedmen's Mission:—We have to tell you that our School-house and Chapel were last night set on fire and burned. It was fired about midnight, and was entirely consumed. It was undoubtedly the work of one or more of the citizens, who hate us and our work, and will do more than this to prevent our going on, if the Government does not extend to us its protection. One week ago last Sabbath evening an anonymous note was brought to us by a little colored boy, who said a white man sent it, threatening us with the direst consequences if we did not desist from teaching and otherwise laboring for the colored people. Vengeance was to come down upon us by the fourth of July if we persisted in our work. We took no notice of the threat, and the fourth passed by without any act of violence being done. Yesterday the military camp which has for some time, been stationed near us, and Gen. Upton's headquarters close at hand, all left, exposing us to the fury of the enemies of our work around us; and so they began their work, which we suppose they intend to continue if more is found by their master for them to do.

Our personal loss is not far from one hundred dollars. The settees in the house were hired by us, and belonged to a church in Nashville. We gave security for them and must pay for their loss. These will cost here, if we replace them, at least seventy-five dollars. There were also in the house the following articles belonging to us: books, charts, clock, desk, table, chairs, pails, &c. Nothing was saved. We have just returned from Nashville, where we have been to see the military department. It promises us an investigation as to the authors of the fire, and protection from further damage or injury. This must be extended to us at once or our stay here will be impossible. We are not safe an hour without it.

In relation to our future work, we will say that we hope to go on by being able to build a house. We shall immediately start a subscription for that purpose and see how much we can raise among this people, and then call upon the friends of the mission everywhere to help make up the deficiency. The colored people will do all they can, and we feel that in God's name much can be done. We are not cast down nor discouraged. God is for us and so we shall go on. By his help we shall "build the house of the Lord." Brethren and sisters everywhere, give us your prayers, give us your alms, and let us unite all for the honor of Christ, the enlightenment and salvation of this poor people.

I. I. LESLIE,
GEO. H. CHILD,
E. A. CHILD.

The following is a letter from I. I. LESLIE to the Chairman of the Freedmen's Mission. It will be read with interest.

Dear Brother Pearson:—The enemy has come upon us with fire, not boldly, but stealthily—not in manly contest for right—not while we were awake, but while good men slept. He has in the darkness of the night applied the torch to our humble house of learning and worship, and it to-day lies in ashes. Our scholars are surrounding the smouldering ruins with sad countenances and aching hearts. They are wandering here and there getting comfort as they can. A silent grief is within every dark breast, and none know what the next thing may be. A general gloom has settled down over every dark countenance, while every white face is lighted up with smiles and joy. We meet them all. You can well imagine our feelings—surrounded by friends who are helpless, and enemies who are powerful. As sheep among wolves are we, liable to be rent in pieces, if God extends not his hand to keep back our enemies. This we believe he will do, and not only this but help us to go on, pressing still more and harder the enemies of truth and righteousness. Our work here is now fairly begun, the good fight commenced, and in God's strength we shall battle until we fail or the enemy gives way. The crisis in this work is upon us. The supporters of slavery are in secret conclave devising means and measures to stop our labors among this people. If we yield one foot of ground, they gain so much. If we become frightened they will take courage. If our hands fall the hearts of this poor people fall with them. But how can we hold our ground without help or reinforcements? The enemy is coming in like a flood; but will the Lord raise up the standard against him without the means to keep it borne aloft? Mighty is he, but he works by means.

We have now no house for school or worship, and none can be had except the wide house of nature, with the heavens for its roofing. This we shall take for our worship, but it is too large for the school.

But as our enemies are not idle, neither are we. Already we have started a subscription among these poor injured ones, fixing the amount which each is to give towards building a house, and not one has yet refused his name. The sum fixed is three dollars for each man, and one dollar for each woman. This we think will be what most of them can give. Some can give more, others can give nothing; but every man's and every woman's name is to go on to the list. We hope to raise six or seven hundred dollars. This we know will not be more than half the money required to build the house, but we will do what we can and leave the rest for God to provide. What way he will take we know not, but that the house will be built we believe, and so go on, trusting the way will be opened as we advance.

We are now beneath the blessing which rests upon those against whom all manner of evil is spoken falsely for Christ's sake. That we rejoice under it I assure you, feeling, however, unworthy of the increased reward. We are happier than our enemies and persecutors; even though they take our lives, our condition is better than theirs. God forgive them if they repent, for I think they know what they do. Inasmuch as they have done it to these poor ones, they have done it to him. This blow fell upon Christ, and they who inflicted it will be judged by him and rewarded.

Pray for us dear brother, and remember us to all the friends of this great and good work. Yours truly and ever.

PROPHECY.

"JERUSALEM IN GLOOM AND GLORY; with a review of Rev. G. B. Bucher's 'objections to error:' By J. M. Orrock, Pastor of the Advent Church, Waterloo, C. E."

Such is the "title page" of a Pamplet of 46 pages, sent us by the Author. The first part of the work, embracing the predictions of Christ concerning his Church, the Jews and Jerusalem is a series of items designed for the use of a class of several ladies to be used at a Sunday school concert. One of those ladies was a member of the Congregationalist church in Granby C. E. The Pastor, Mr. Bucher, presented ten objections to the premillennial views; to which Mr. Orrock has responded very effectually in the work before us.

The items presented for the consideration of the class of ladies were the following, and are worthy of the consideration of all:

1. Jerusalem, as it existed at the first Advent of Jesus Christ, was built on several hills,—the two principal of which were Zion and Acra. It was surrounded by three walls on every side, except where it was inclosed with deep valleys which were deemed inaccessible—and in such places it had but one wall. Each wall was fortified by high towers. The temple, so often mentioned in the Bible, was on the east side of the city, and directly opposite the mount of Olives.

2. The doom of the city was pronounced with tears by the prophet like unto Moses: "Saying, If thou hadst known, even thou, at least in this thy day, the things which belong unto thy peace! but now they are hid from thine eyes; for the days shall come upon thee, that thine enemies shall cast a trench about thee, and compass thee round, and keep thee in on every side, and shall lay thee even with the ground and thy children within thee; and they shall not leave in thee one stone upon another; because thou knewest not the time of thy visitation."—Luke xix. 42–44. This took place under Titus, the Roman General, A. D. 70,—or less than 40 years after the prophecy was uttered. To "cast a trench" means to throw up earth as a fortification, and Josephus informs us that Titus, in order to force the people to surrender by famine built a wall around the city and fortified it with thirteen towers.

3. The destruction of the temple was distinctly announced thus: "O, Jerusalem, thou that killest the prophets, and stonest them which are sent unto thee, how often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not! Behold, your house is left unto you desolate.... And Jesus went out, and departed from the temple: and his disciples came to him for to show him the buildings of the temple. And Jesus said unto them, See ye not all these things? Verily I say unto you, there shall not be left here one stone upon another, that shall not be thrown down."—Matt. xxiii. 37, 38; xxiv. 1, 2. Titus, though anxious to save the temple, was unable to do so: it was burnt and destroyed, and a plough-share drawn over the sacred spot.

4. Christ foretold that previous to the overthrow of the city and temple the Jews would persecute Christians: "But before all these, they shall lay their hands on you and persecute you, delivering you up to the synagogues, and into prisons, being brought before kings and rulers for my name's sake; and ye shall be betrayed both by parents, and brethren, and kinsfolks, and friends; and some of you shall they cause to be put to death."—Luke xxi. 12, 16. The book of Acts shows that this was literally fulfilled.

5. Strange sights were to be seen before the destruction of Jerusalem: "And great earthquakes shall be in divers places, and famines, and pestilences; and fearful sights and great signs shall there be from heaven." —Luke xxi. 11. Josephus who lived at the time, and was connected with the war, mentions among other things that a star resembling a sword stood over the city, and a comet continued a whole year; that at the feast of unleavened bread, during the night a light shone around the altar and temple, so great that it seemed to be bright day-time for half an hour;—that the eastern gate of the temple which was made of brass and secured by strong bolts and bars, and which had been shut with difficulty by twenty men, opened in the night of its own accord;—that a few days after the feast, "before sun-setting, chariots and troops of soldiers in their armor were seen running about among the clouds and surrounding of cities;"—and that at another time a great noise, as the sound of a multitude, was heard in the temple, saying, "let us remove hence."

6. Christ foretold that the Jews, having despised the true Prophet, would be abused and deluded by false ones: "And many false prophets shall rise, and shall deceive many." —Matt. 24. 11. Josephus testifies that "a great number of false prophets imposed upon the people;" and that "the country was filled with robbers and imposters, who deluded the multitude."

7. Christ taught that after the siege of Jerusalem had commenced there would be an opportunity for Christians to escape from it, and commanded them to do so: "And when ye shall see Jerusalem compassed with armies, then know that the desolation thereof is nigh. Then let them which are in Judea flee to the mountains; and let them which are in the midst of it depart out; and let not them that are in the countries enter thereinto; for these be the days of vengence, that all things which are written may be fulfilled."—Luke xxi. 20–22. Accordingly, when the Romans under Cestius Gallus made their first advance toward Jerusalem, Josephus says that Cestius, despairing of success, "retired from the city without any reason in the world;" and that "if he had but continued the siege a little longer, he would certainly have taken it." This withdrawal of the army, however, gave the Jewish Christians an opportunity to flee to Pella in Persia, and to the mountains of Perea, which they did, and escaped the destruction.

8. Christ foretold that there would "be great distress in the land and wrath upon this people," and that they would "fall by the edge of the sword." Their sufferings from famine were horrible; and it is estimated that not fewer than eleven hundred thousand perished by the sword and otherwise during the five months that the siege lasted, besides tens of thousands were slain in the adjacent provinces. Many hundreds of them were whipped and tortured and then crucified; so terribly was their imprecation fulfilled—"His blood be on us and on our children"

9. "They shall be led away captive into all nations"— was another prediction of Christ; and Josephus reckons that the captives taken during the whole war—which lasted seven years—amounted to 97,000. The tall and handsome young men were reserved by Titus to grace his triumphal entry into Rome; many were destroyed by wild beasts in the theatres; many were sold as slaves, and multitudes were sent to Egypt to work in the mines,—thereby fulfilling the prediction of Moses also: "And the Lord shall bring thee into Egypt again with ships: by the way whereof I spake unto thee, thou shalt see it no more again: and there ye shall be sold unto your enemies for bondmen and bondwomen, and no man shall buy you."—Deut. xxviii. 68.

10. Of the continued subjection of the city our Saviour said: "And Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles, until the time of the Gentiles be fulfilled." This wonderful prophecy is still in the course of fulfilment. Since the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans under Titus the Jews have made several attempts to recover their city and to rebuild the temple, but have signally failed. The Romans, Grecians, Persians, Saracens, Mamelukes of Egypt, French English, Arabs and Turks have successively trodden it down. The times of the Gentiles have not yet expired; and the feet of Gentile masters still press the sacred soil.

11. During the long period of Gentile rule false Christs were to arise and successfully practice deception: "Jesus answered and said unto them, Take heed that no man deceive you: for many shall come in my name, saying, I am Christ, and shall deceive many."—Matt; xxiv. 4, 5. The names of twenty-four false Messiahs are recorded as having appeared between the time of the emperor Adrian—fifty years after the destruction of the city by Titus—and the year 1682, when Rabbi Mordecai of Germany—the last of any note—appeared. Thousands were deceived by them; but it is worthy of observation that no one appeared claiming to be the Messiah till the true Christ had come, and had been rejected by the nation.

12. Our Saviour having announced the destruction and down-treading of Jerusalem for successive centuries, proceeded to state that in connection with the termination of the times of the Gentiles "there shall be signs in the sun and in the moon, and in the stars; and upon the earth distress of nations with perplexity; the sea and the waves roaring; men's hearts failing them for fear, and for looking after those things which are coming on the earth; for the powers of heaven shall be shaken; and then shall they see the Son of man coming in a cloud with power and great glory." "And he shall send his angels with a great sound of trumpet, and they shall gather together his elect from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other."—Luke xxi. 25–27; Matt. xxiv. 31. Immanuel's land will therefore be trodden down of the Gentiles

"Till o'er our ransomed nature
The Lamb for sinners slain,—
Redeemer, King, Creator,— Returns, in bliss to reign."

"Then the moon shall be confounded, and the sun ashamed, when the Lord of hosts shall reign in Mount Zion and in Jerusalem, and before his ancients gloriously."—Isa. xxiv. 23. "And the ransomed of the Lord shall return and come to Zion with songs and everlasting joy upon their heads: they shall obtain joy and gladness, and sorrow and sighing shall flee away."—Isa. xxxv. 10.

13. The time of Gentile supremacy on earth was symbolized by the four great beasts which the prophet Daniel saw in vision rise out of a stormy sea,—and by the great image which Nebuchadnezzar beheld in his dream; and is now so far expired in the history of Babylon, Medo-Persia, Grecia and Rome, that we feel warranted in saying, with the late John King Lord—a Congregational minister of Cincinnati,—that "we stand on the threshold of the millennium," and "relieved against the back-ground of history stands the great image of gold, and silver, and brass, and iron, —looming up like a mighty pillar between us and the sky from which the sun has just descended. Right opposite, with beams of the morning just reddening the summit, rises in majestic grandeur the mountain of the house of God. Invisible hands are heaving from its side a living stone. It trembles on its poise, and in the pathway along which it must speedily rush, that monument of the empires is reared. Who can conceive or describe the terrors of the collision! The solid earth will shake. The sea shall depart from its place, and unwrap itself from its dead. The heavens shall be rolled together as a scroll, and the stars shall fall from their places. The beast and the false prophet shall be thurst into the bottomless pit, and the angel shall lock them in. And Christ shall come. Already he makes ready his coming. The chariots of salvation are gathering for the triumphant career. The attendant hosts are waiting for the signal. Christ is coming."—Sermons, pp. 182–3.

14. Prophecy is history in advance; and it seems next to impossible that any man should duly consider the predictions to which your attention has been called, and the exact fulfilment of them, and if he is a believer, not be confirmed in the faith, and if a skeptic not be convinced that Christianity is of God. The literal fulfilment of these prophecies in the past is a pledge of the accomplishment of those that remain. False Christs have arisen as predicted—and we wait for the coming again of the true Christ. "For as the lightning cometh out of the east, and shineth even unto the west: so shall also the coming of the Son of Man be." Matt. xxiv. 27. We have witnessed the desolations of Jerusalem, and now wait for it to "be made an eternal excellency, the joy of many generations." The "times of the Gentiles" have lasted long, but they will surely be succeeded by the times of the Messiah.

THE WORLD ON FIRE.

The day had been fine with a moderate wind from the northwest. When the sun went down behind the ridge of mountains limiting the bay, a perfect calm followed, with a sky absolutely cloudless. At 4 P. M. there had been seen one solitary and peculiar cloud hanging in the heavens to the north about 15 degrees above the horizon. This cloud was a deep, dark blue, looking much like the capital letter S. This at last disappeared, and the night set in, still, beautiful and mild, with myriads of stars shining with apparently greater brilliancy than ever.

I had gone on deck several times to look at the beauteous scene, and at nine o'clock was below in my cabin, going to bed, when the captain hailed me with the words, "Come above, Hall, at once! The world is on fire!"

I knew his meaning, and, quick as thought, I re-dressed myself, scrambled over several sleeping Innuits close to my berth and rushed to the companion stairs. In another moment I reached the deck, and, as the cabin door swung open, a dazzling, overpowering light as if the world was really ablaze under the agency of some gorgeously-colored fires burst upon my startled senses! How can I describe it? Again, I say, no mortal hand can truthfully do so. Let me, however, in feeble, broken words, put down, my thoughts at the time, and try to give some faint idea of what I saw.

My first thought was, "Among the gods there is none like unto thee, O Lord! neither are there any works like unto thy works!" Then I tried to picture the scenes before me. Piles of golden light and rainbow light, scattered along the azure vault, extended from behind the western horizon to the zenith, thence down to the eastern, within a belt of space 20 degrees in width, were the fountains of beams like fire threads, that shot with the rapidity of lightning hither and and thither, upward and athwart the great pathway indicated. No sun, no moon, yet the heavens were a glorious sight, flooded with light. Even ordinary print could have been easily read on deck.

Flooded with rivers of light. Yes, flooded with light; and such light! Light all but inconceivable. The golden hues predominated: but, in rapid succession, prismatic colors leaped forth.

We, looked, we saw, we trembled; for even as we gazed, the whole belt of aurora began to be alive with flashes. Then each bank of light became myriads; some now drooping down the great pathway or belt, others springing up, others leaping with lightning flash from one side, while more as quickly passed into the vacated space; some twisting themselves into folds, entwining with others like enormous serpents, and all these movements as quick as the eye could follow. It seemed as if there was a struggle with these heavenly lights to reach and occupy the dome above our heads. Then the whole arch above became crowded. Down, down it came; nearer and nearer it approached us. Sheets of golden flame, coruscating while leaping from the auroral belt, seemed as if met in their course by some mighty agency that turned them into the colors of the rainbow, each of the seven primary, 3 degrees in width sheeted out to 21 degrees—the prismatic bows at right angles with the belt.

While the auroral fires seemed to be descending upon us, one of our number could not help exclaiming,

"Hark! hark! such a wonderful display! almost as if a warfare was going on among the beauteous lights above—so palpable—so near —seems impossible without noise."

But no noise accompanied the wondrous display. All was silence.

After we had again descended into our cabin, so strong was the impression of awe left upon us that the captain said to me,

"Well, during the last eleven years I have spent mostly in these northern regions, I never have seen anything of the aurora to approach that glorious vivid display just witnessed. And to tell you the truth, friend Hall, I do not care to see the like ever again.—Hall's Arctic Researches.

THE WAY INTO CHRIST.

BY W. S. CAMPBELL.

I am more and more astonished at the discovery of the ignorance of the great proportion of those professing to indorse the gospel, upon the question of justification by faith. Practically ignoring the position of Christ, in our salvation, it is assumed that what we perform, as I have stated in a former number, secures our connection with the Redeemer, and an escape from hell fire. They most stoutly claim that they are evangelical. It is only obedience, they teach, and we must obey! Even, some sects, who have boasted so much of the doctrines of grace, fall into this terrible condemnation of urging specific works, (such as are very easily performed, when men are in fear of eternal torment) pertaining to the church, as ordinances, on which ground the "immortal soul" shall be received into paradise, when the man dies.

We cannot observe any more evangelism in them than in or Jew a papist. They can boast of accessions. Then, evangelical or not, each one in looking "for his gain from his quarter;" for each is making all haste to add the largest number, by means of the enforcement of their own ground of acceptance with God. Even some of the Adventists can make a very considerable splarge over the calling of a negative proposition, a doctrine of the Gospel, (which is admissible, using language by accommodation, as we all do), and yet one doctrine, which must become an essential and saving act, is all that would be found necessary if his position be correct; for if a man believe enough to be immersed, it is no matter what else he believes, or whether he concedes the truth of what the Almighty has declared, by Jesus Christ, either by negative or affirmative propositions, or otherwise.

To get into Christ, they tell us, a man must be immersed—for immersion is the door into the Church, and they tell us it is the Church of Christ, whether he is washed from sin, or yet an unbeliever. But he will be washed when he gets into Christ. Then if baptism, by immersion, brings him to Christ, this washes him, does it not? If so, as this is his own act, does he not wash himself? And here is the great dishonor to Christ. No need of the Spirit here; and what wonder if it is rejected? No need of faith, only apprehend your duty! And yet one apostle who learned to worship God, by faith in Christ, by his commission saw the error of his exclusive ground of acceptance, the ground of an act, which had been positively enjoined, (circumcision) said, "it (baptism) is not the putting away of the filth of the flesh, but the answer of a good conscience toward God." "Oh, well, it is the answer of a good conscience!" A good conscience! Does that make a good Christian? Did not Paul have a good conscience before God while he was an unconverted Pharisee? And why? because he was destitute of faith. Being destitute, at first, of all true conception of the evidences on which faith rests. Doubtless, Mohamedans, Jews, and Heathen have good consciences. It does not make gospel Christians, by any means. But the reply is that it is necessary, because we without it cannot be justified. Did you ever think it was necessary to have the good conscience first? If the man, with a renewed heart, having put off the old man with his deed, being in Christ, a new creature, with old things (the works and filth of the flesh) put away, or passed away, and all things become new, has such a conscience, let him answer it. If he is in Christ his conscience is new and good: having his "heart sprinkled from an evil conscience" he will have a good conscience if he has any. And there is reference in the sprinkling to the blood of Christ. It is the blood of sprinkling. By connection with that blood, his conscience is "purged from dead works;" consequently, he does not immerse his conscience clean, nor go into the water to get an answer before he has the good state of heart, (conscience,) the state of justification, concerning which thousands deceive themselves; for they have been to the water and brought back the answer; yet the conscience, (state of the heart) is just what it was before. Why? They acted without faith. It is sin.

This presuming to make a good conscience, by making an answer to whatever impulse of duty a man may have, is worse, if possible, than the Jewish ground of justification; for God told them precisely what to do; and when they had done it, they knew they had the conscience, though they were filled with an evil heart of unbelief; just as men are now who trust to acts: and should they not trust to them, if they have this essential character?

"They were immersed into Christ." There is an assumption in this position (I hope they do not call it a doctrine) which strikes at the whole plan of God, in saving sinners, and would unsettle the entire arrangement of the atonement, washing of regeneration and renewing of the Holy Ghost! "Other foundation can no man lay." Yet this mode of teaching Christ, neglects it, altogether, except in name and an outward ordinance, which, if binding, is in him, and not before him. That baptism puts him in Christ, does it? Who did it? The minister. Are you certain that he was a man of God? "Oh that makes no difference; it was my duty, and he led me to Christ." Who was it? The man who professed a wish to be found in Christ, or who wished to be baptised unto repentance, i. e., he had made up his mind to repent, and took this way to get the condition; to get repentance! Why. does he not do that which God enjoins? Have they faith before repentance? Such as they teach!

Oh Bellamy! New Divinity! Palmiest days of New England Calvinism! Ye all did not, in your arduous zeal to ensure the calling of the elect, so disparage and displace the Son of God. Here, in the prairie soil of the West, have the anti-gospel principles ye enunciated, which would not root along the Atlantic coast, and among the granite hills of the East, grown rank, as weeds of sin and error, and borne luxuriantly the fruit of unbelief and death!

The candidate is taken to Christ through (under) the water, whatever agent takes him. I will not say what one might do it. He comes, let him be what he may, Infidel or Jew, rejector of the truth as it is in Jesus, or the truth of Jesus. He is not refused! Why should he be? this takes him into Christ! He is sincere! What of that? So were the Jews who crucified Christ: so have been the Papists, exclusives, and unbelievers who were not enlightened by the Spirit of God.

It is the water then, that effects the change of relation, and consequently the union to Christ. Nay, they immerse them into him. It is then, essential, is it not? Safe plan that! In Christ! How can they get out? Can they become unregenerate? Can they obliterate the fact and destroy the act of their immersion? They have done something that will "answer"! The divine exhibition, where is that?

If this mode of securing a relation to Christ, being, as it manifestly is, independent, of the new, regenerate nature, the state of the heart which is obtained by the blood of Christ, through the influence of the Holy Spirit—if this is salvation by grace through faith, then "grace is no more grace." But my opponent replies, "It is duty." The first duty of the convicted mind is to believe on Jesus Christ, with the heart unto righteousness, which of consequence embraces the state of the affections; next to confess him with your mouth unto salvation. Then, profess your faith in him; and baptism may be an effectual way of declaring, by an outward sign or act, what you have inwardly received, and you may manifest thus to the world your faith in the resurrection of the dead in Christ, as this may signify that we are planted in the likeness of his death (not by it), by dying to the world daily, as Paul did; being crucified with Christ. You will thus express your hope of being found in the likeness of his resurrection, which, by the way, cannot embrace sinners; for they are not in his likeness, and his resurrection is the example and power of all that follow.

There is still the proposition of obedience to be noticed. We are told that this is a simple question of obedience. Well them, obey! Do what you are told, and do it in the spirit of obedience; for observe, under the new dispensation, the spirit you are of, is a very important consideration. There will be some working in the heart while you are working out," if your obedience is accepted.

Christ, in his position, makes all our performance, that God enjoins, acceptable; hence, all are said to be wrought in or by faith. It is Christ who becomes our wisdom and righteousness. Does not that embrace obedience, duty, all that you ought to, or can do? Out of him, away from him, working will not secure righteousness; else "work is no more work." To do a commanded act outside of this relation, be it what it may, (good even in itself) will not make you righteous, or justify you; for that would deprive him of his honor. He has assured us that his merit and grace are the basis of our justification. A minister, not far from here, declared that the blood of Christ was not efficacious to save us until it was brought into connection with the water. Well, the idea is novel! Diluted blood of Christ! It cannot wash away sins till water is applied to it! Is it too powerful? Or is the sinner too weak—too slight and feeble a trasgressor to bear it? Give it weakened! Aye, often neutralized. It is none too mighty, or pure, to effect the cleansing. It is sufficient, and all-powerful. Reduced, it may produce changes, in the patient, but never recovery. But this position of a man who was carried away in his zeal by baptism, as a saving act of justification, while it staggered some people, is only the natural outgrowth of believing that baptism is the essential door into Christ; which, by the way, is really set forth in every instance of and advertised sect-milled converts, in the terms, "baptised into the Christ." Only ignorance or want of reflection, 'saves this from the charge of blasphemy. Does it not reject the Holy Ghost? And then, if the blood does not cleanse us, from all unrighteousness, how shall the praise be given to him who, by his blood, hath cleansed, redeemed, and saved us? Here is a divided power. Will the result be divided? Or will the honor and praise arise in two departments? Do they think the resurrection of the "unjust" (such as have heard their gospel and have not become "just," by doing the act they were told to) will be secured by the operation? Shall God and Christ, and the Holy Ghost fail; then the sinner help himself into Christ? Shade of Bellamy! Prometheus of metaphysical exegesis; enlighten us! "Conversion before conviction." "Faith before repentance." More Anon. (New Divinity.)

OUR STRANGER FRIEND ONCE MORE.

TO THE EDITOR OF HERALD OF LIFE: Sir,—Since I last wrote, some tracts of your scame to my hands. The subjects on which they treat are of very great interest, even to those who hold the old views. I would therefore with your permission take them up seriatim. Truth can stand examination. If to many of your readers the subjects are not new, they will not be losers by being put in remembrance; while to many no doubt the solution of the difficulties which present themselves to my mind will be very welcome.

In the tract entitled "Man's Nature and Destiny" is the statement that man in his composition is no more than other animals. He is made of flesh and breath: when the latter is exhausted or stopped, he dies and is no more; except in the case when one believes in the Lord of Life, he receives a new nature, which goes on developing all his life, and will arrive at maturity on the last day. Query:

1. If the "breath of life" breathed into man, is nothing more than the breath common to beasts, how is it that this particular is omitted in the narration of the creation of the lower animals? If it is because it is a self evident fact, why is it superfluously added in the account of man's creation? That man has breath, is at least as evident as that the lower animals possess it.

2. The Scripture declaration that "death entered by sin" proves that the constitution of man was not subject to decay, but was made so "by the offence of one."

3. As no "nature" can exist independent of a "being," the new nature received by man when he believes in Christ, must be either a transmutation of the "unit" man into a spiritual from a carnal being, or an addition of a new being called soul, or spirit, given to the believer only, and to this addenda a spiritual nature is attached. If the former is the case, then it is impossible for the transformed unit to act, or strive against carnal propensities which it longer possesseth, having become a spiritual unit, as it formerly was an animal one. If the latter is the case, and the believer becomes "a dual," then, the language of the apostle Rom. vii. 22, is indeed intelligible. and we comprehend what "the inward man" is: but how can this be called "born again"? the old unit, the flesh which was once born, is not born again when it receives the new lodger within it. Let this suffice for the present. PHILALETHES.

REMARKS BY J. T. C.—We hope that Philalethes will be true to his name, and be a friend of truth indeed, "in whom there is no guile." We are glad that "some tracts" on the sublime and inspiring theme of Future and Eternal Life through Jesus Christ alone, have flown to rescue him from "oppositions of science, falsely so called." We rejoice that he acknowledges them to be "of very great interest," and trust that many "who hold the old views" will be brought to the same admission. May "the Spirit of truth" lead all the Philalethean brotherhood "into all truth."

We congratulate our friend that he has made such a happy choice from among the tracts that have come to him, and has taken up for first consideration "Man's Nature and Destiny." It is a masterly statement of the pith of the Gospel. Plain, direct, irresistible is the argument. Its brevity is a fit comment on the simplicity of the plan of salvation through Christ. The orthodoxy of the nineteenth century are lost in a wilderness of words, and suppose that the doctrines of the New Testament cannot be thoroughly comprehended without great learning, both philological and metaphysical. But let any person become acquainted with the argument set forth in this tract, no matter how "poor" he may be, he will be able to say that "the Gospel is preached unto him." We would have more confidence in such a person's conceptions than in all the husks that have been gathered from the brains of Fathers, Professors, and D. D.'s, since the church backslid to the serpent's lie. The Atonement by Christ has been buried out of sight by the veriest twaddle, and it is high time that the simplicity of the truth were made known to the famishing Church.

We think that Philalethes would have done better if he had quoted such portions of the tract as he has noticed. We should then have been able to distinguish between what the tract says, and what Philalethes makes it say. When, for example, it is said that man "is made of flesh and breath," readers should understand that this is the statement, not of the tract, but of Philalethes. The tract says, "Man by his natural birth is a unit, and is flesh." After quoting some proof texts, the tract further says,—"Here we see that man is distinctly called flesh; and, so far as his nature is concerned, he is placed on a level with the animals around, and is subjected to the same destiny. Nothing is said of his possessing a nature differing from theirs, or of an end, or doom, that is different: both live by the breath in their 'nostrils;' and both men and beasts are subjected to the same death, and by the same means: all are FLESH; all have 'the breath of the spirit of life' [margin]; all are destroyed, or died. Such is inspired testimony; and no word is uttered indicating a spiritual nature in men, that would survive in death, any more than in beasts." No such composition as "flesh and breath" is mentioned in the tract. Man is flesh, and lives by the breath in his nostrils. This is Bible truth; will Philalethes deny it? We pass to the first query.

"If the 'breath of life' breathed into man, is nothing more than the breath common to beasts, how is it that this particular is omitted in the narration of the creation of the lower animals?" Does Philalethes really mean that because the record uses a form of words in relation to man which it does not in relation to the beasts, therefore the latter are necessarily excluded from participating in the particular spoken of? God said unto Noah,—"Behold, I, even I, do bring a flood of waters upon the earth, to destroy all flesh, wherein is the breath of life from under heaven; and every thing that is in the earth shall die." According to Philalethes' argument, there is nothing referred to here but man; for he is the only thing of all flesh of whom it is said, "God breathed into his nostrils the breath of life." Because the same thing is not said of the beasts, therefore they are without the breath of life. What is this but bondage to the letter? It is enough to know that all flesh has "the breath of the spirit of life,"—fowl, cattle, beast, creeping thing, and every man. Gen. vii 21, 22. Man being the noblest object in God's creation, from the fact of his superior organization and prospects, the Scriptures are naturally more diffuse in expression with respect to him than they are to the irrational brute. Let a child and a dog be born on the same day and under one roof; many incidents common to both creatures are noticed in the one case and totally disregarded in the other. This point is hardly worth dwelling on. We might refer to the particularity of Ps. civ. 29 in relation to the death of the beasts. It is a clear case of parallelism with Eccl. xii. 7. The same ruah that "returns to God" in the latter case does so in the former.

Paragraph "2" of Philalethes must be objected to. "The Scripture declaration" to which he refers, instead of proving "that the constitution of man was not subject to decay," proves the direct reverse; for if the constitution of man had not been subject to decay, it could not have decayed. It is impossible to destroy a deathless being. To understand Paul's declaration, we have to make a distinction between the case of Adam at creation and his case in the garden of Eden. In his constitution at creation were the seeds of dissolution; in the garden was a preventive of dissolution—the tree of life. So long as Adam remained in the garden he was kept from death; not because his constitution was not subject to decay, but because the tree of life counteracted the law of dissolution in his nature. But when he transgressed the commandment, he was driven from the garden, and being unable to get hold of the specific against death, the law of corruption wrought out the inevitable result. Death came upon Adam as a consequence of his expulsion from paradise, and his expulsion was a consequence of his sin. As Adam was a representative of the entire race of man, all are involved in the sin, the expulsion, the death. And this is the sum of Paul's meaning; the phliosophy

"Of man's first disobedience and the fruit
Of that forbidden tree, whose mortal taste
Brought death into the world and all our woe
With loss of Eden, till one greater man
Restore us, and regain the blissful seat."

But one point in "3" appears to need notice. The phrase "born again" was used in the tract in deference to the common translation. "Begotten again," would be true to the original and remove the difficulty of Phialelethes.

A BASELESS INFERENCE.

Bishop Clark, of the Methodist Church, on page 184 of his "Man All Immortal," has the following paragraph:—

"Upon the Mount of Transfiguration Moses and Elias, though the one had been dead fifteen hundred years, and the other had been translated over a thousand years before, not only appeared in the form of living men, though with bodies glorious—emblematic of the glorious resurrection state—but they also conversed, thus demonstrating that they were not only alive but conscious. And if Moses has a conscious existence in the intermediate state, why may not all others?"

Thus reasons our distinguished advocate of inherent immortality in his efforts to sustain the proposition "that the intermediate state of the dead is a state of conscious existence." But argues he wisely? Finds his doctrine of life in death any support in the sublime scenes of the Transfiguration? Consider:

1. The proposition cited from the Bishop relates professedly to "the dead." What is meant by this? Consciousness is here plainly predicated of "the dead," but what is intended by the affirmation? That the body is "conscious"? Certainly not, though every one admits that the body, in "the intermediate state," is "dead." What then can it mean? The answer is obvious: the purpose of the statement is to assert that man's spiritual nature—his "soul"—is "conscious." But are departed souls "the dead"? They cannot be if they are immortal; and since Bishop Clark contends that they are immortal, his theory of intermediate consciousness should find expression in a different formula. So long as men of his school maintain that the thinking and knowing powers of man triumph over the stroke of physical dissolution, they have no right whatever to speak of a conscious intermediate state as pertaining to "the dead." We who are on the unpopular side of this question are agreed that what there is of humanity from the close of the present life till the resurrection is properly and Scripturally called "the dead"; but with this belief of ours is the conviction that "the dead know not any thing." This conviction has the merit of being able to express itself in Bible words, and these in turn have the merit of being not self-contradictory. The notion of being dead, is quite in harmony with that of being without knowledge or consciousness, but it in no way comports with the idea of being in a state where wisdom is possessed in a degree immeasurably superior to the highest intellectual attainments of human beings during their sojourn here "in the land of the living." Besides all this, that which is dead may have a resurrection, and accordingly the Bible declares that "the dead shall be raised," but that which popular theology is pleased—as in the work of Bishop Clark—to call "the dead" and to say is "conscious," it never speaks of as the subject of the resurrection. Remember, ye Doctors of Divinity, that an ancient but Divine maxim reads thus: "How forcible are right words." Tell us not, therefore, that "the dead" are in "a state of consciousness," for you really believe nothing of the kind; but tell us rather that man's soul, in "the intermediate state," is "conscious" because inherently immortal and, consequently, incapable of death. You will thus talk coherently, and there will only remain for you the delicate little task of citing us to just one inspired utterance, if you can find it, authorizing the stupendous assertion that the soul of man is immortal! Men who love to give us "demonstrations" of their theories should not turn a deaf ear to this demand.

2. But let us come back to the transfiguration, or, rather, to what Bishop Clark has to say of it. Does not his paragraph contain an utterly baseless inference? an inference for which his own reasoning affords no ground whatever? Two eminent personages are mentioned. One of them is "Elias"—the prophet Elijah of the Old Testament. He, like good Enoch at a much earlier period, was translated, and doubtless for the same reason that Enoch was—"that he should not see death." "Elias," then, not dying, never entered what is called "the intermediate state." He lived right on, and his presence at the Transfiguration must, therefore, be held as no proof that "all others"—to whom the honors of translation are denied—are in death both "alive" and "conscious." It was mistakenly said of our dying Redeemer, "This man calleth for Elias"; it may be truthfully said of the immortal-soul dogma that it often "calleth for Elias" to give countenance to its unscriptural pretensions. "Whether Elias will come to save" it we need not wait to "see"; that he did not give it a lawful weapon by appearing "in glory" on the mount is very certain, though many blinded visions fail to see the fact.

But the Bishop also mentions Moses. He was at the Transfiguration; "and what will you do with his case?" asks the immortal-soul believer with triumph. Do with it? Why, just what the author of "Man All Immortal" has done in the paragraph before us. The Bishop admits that Moses appeared in the form of a living man. If so, he did not appear in the form of a disembodied human ghost, be that form (?) what it may! Now we do not think there was any make-believe in the matter. If Moses had no ghostly appearance at the Transfiguration, we regard it as certain that he was not a ghost. The supposition that he was there "disembodied" seems forbidden by the plain tenor of the account as given to us by the Evangelists. Our Lord was there bodily. So was "Elias." So was Peter. So was James. So was John. Now if the sixth individual was there without a body, the narrative should give us some hint of the wonderful phenomenon. But it gives us none. And what is more, Bishop Clark, singularly regardless of logical coherence, distinctly admits that Moses, equally with Elijah, had a body! But who does not see that his argument crumbles to pieces under the weight of this concession? Let Bishop Clark tell us how the body of Moses got there, and we shall not be long in telling him how Moses got there! The miracle of a resurrection is essential to his explanation of the matter; but it so happens that that hypothesis is all that is needed by those who assert that dead people are not alive. And it also happens that our resurrection theory is free from the incongruities belong to that held by the Bishop's school. We read in the sacred record that Moses died, and that God buried him, and we believe it. The Bishop reads the same thing, but believes that the "clay tenement" of Israel's great leader died, and was buried, while the real Moses, being deathless and having "shuffled off" his "mortal coil," went to the spirit land. (The offence at Meribah, though it kept him from entering the earthly Canaan, was no hindrance to his ascending immediately to heaven!) So at the Transfiguration. We hold that, as there was but one Moses, who both died and was buried, the Moses on the mount could have been none other than he, and that his prior resurrection was, therefore, a necessity. Thus, and thus only, can the bodily presence which Bishop Clark concedes be accounted for, but this view of the transaction leaves the notion of disembodied consciousness seeking for proof which it must find, if it finds it at all, without any "help" from Moses. His "bodily presence" on the Mount is as much at war with it as is the record he has left us of the fact that "the Lord God formed MAN of the dust of the ground." If Bishops and other religious teachers desire to enforce by example the doctrine that the intermediate state is one of life and consciousness, let them give us Bible instances that have no "bodies glorious" in them. Nothing that is "emblematic" of the "resurrection state" will answer the purpose, but as the scenes "upon the Mount" are admitted, even in the case of Moses, to be emblematic in that direction, the required example must be looked for elsewhere. He who finds it will take high rank in the list of discoverers.

II. "Having said thus much, we proceed to our next enquiry; namely, Whether there be any evidence to show that the numbers of any of the versions have been corrupted?

'Our preceding investigations have already pointed out the Hebrew as the text which has in all probability been altered; and the latter part of the first, and the beginning of the second, century of the Christian era, as the time when this was done.

We know that this opinion involves a serious charge against those who were then intrusted with this copy the sacred oracles. We are also aware that an allegation of this kind ought not to be made hastily, or on slight grounds. And we are sure that, except on strong and indisputable evidence, it will not be regarded as proved against a people supposed to regard the Scriptures generally, and the writings of Moses in particular, with universal and unbounded reverence. It has consequently been taken for granted, that the Jews could have had no motive for vitiating their sacred books; and that even if they had, their high principles, would have kept them above the influence of the temptation. It is our duty to cast light upon this subject.

It is necessarary here to premise, that the time pointed out as the probable period of this alteration was one of the most intense excitement to the Jewish people, and of peril to their cause. The descendants of Israel had previously endured disasters and defeat; they had seen their glorious temple and monarchy destroyed, and had languished in captivity and exile. Yet, amid all this desolation and distress, they possessed a substantial foundation for hope in the promises of Jehovah: they fled to this refuge, and exercised a strong faith in their holy religion; trusting to the hope of Israel, and believing in the promise of redemption to the seed of Abraham.

But now the case was altered. The promised Messiah had appeared, and had been rejected and crucified. During the first century after his resurrection, the progress of the gospel was most triumphant; many of the Jews, and multitudes of the Gentiles, in every part of the Roman empire, had embraced the cross, and acknowledged Jesus as their Saviour. The unbelieving Jews saw, in the progress and establishment of Christianity, the the destruction of their proudest hopes. Jerusalem was again ruined: and no Jeremiah appeared commissioned by God to predict the period of their humiliation: they had ceased to be the peculiar people of the Lord; and their cause was thrown into other hands.

Conscious of the impotence of rage, they were compelled to meet Christian teachers in the field of controvery; and here they were signally foiled. The common ground of appeal was necessarily the Old Testament Scriptures. What course then remained to those Jews who still persisted in their unbelief? Only one was open to them. The Hebrew at this time was a learned language, few of the Jews being critically acquainted with it; the Scriptures in this tongue "were almost entirely neglectey;" the generality of the Jewish people and the Christians having their knowledge of the Scriptures confined to the Septuagint version. From this our Lord and his apostles uniformly quoted; from this source the first Christian writers drew their proof that Jesus was the Messiah, and that the Christian religion was indeed the new covenant which God had promised to make with all people. In these circumstances, then, it is evident, that the Jewish elders had a powerful motive to alledge that the Greek version did not accurately set forth the sense of the original Scriptures, and as the Hebrew copies were almost entirely in their own hands, to make such alterations in them as should sustain the allegation.

No one who will review the whole of the circumstances can doubt the existance of a strong temptation to this line of conduct: let us see whether there be sufficient proof that it was adopted. The crime, if perpetrated at all, must have been done in secret; and considering the circumstances of the time, and the character and position of the parties implicated, it must be no easy task to supply, after the lapse of so many centuries, the required proof. And yet we think, even under all these disadvantages, that we can adduce particulars which will establish our position.

First. We have at least presumptive evidence in the simple and acknowledged facts of the case. The Hebrew and Septuagint must originally have agreed; they now differ, and have differed since the second century. Whence could this variation arise? Certainly not from the alteration of the Septuagint; for it was in extensive circulation: Jews and Christians alike held it in their hands. No conspiracy of a sect, therefore, could, if the attempt had been made, have done more than introduce a mass of various readings; it could not have effected a general alteration of particular passages, or vitiation of dates. With the Hebrew the case was the reverse. The copies of this version were generally in the hands of priests and elders, who were united together by strong sympathy, and who, hating Christianity, felt every disposition to join their efforts in order to cast discredit upon it. The motive and the power lay entirely in the way of corrupting the Hebrew text.

Secondly. But it may be said, "If this had been done, there were some Christian teachers who possessd learning and zeal to have detected the imposture." Yes; and they have done so. We might quote many eminent christian writers that lived near the age of the Apostles who clearly asserted the fact, that this alteration of the Scriptures was effected by the Jews, and for this purpose. We select a few:—

Justin Martyr was a native of Palestine, and suffered martyrdom at Rome A. D, 165. He entered largely into the controversy between the Jews and the Christians, and distinctly asserts that the former had actually erased several whole passages from the Scriptures. Remarking on this, Mr. Whitaker observes: "This charge of Justin, against the Jews stood unshaken in its authority. It rests firmly on its own substratum of evidence. He has asserted it, who from his eldership had the power of knowing it. He has asserted it whose judgment cannot be deceived in such a substantial fact, and whose veracity is beyond all exception."—Whitaker's Origin of Arianism, p. 311.

Irenæus was a native of Asia Minor, enjoyed the friendship of Polycarp, and flourished in the second century. He assures us that the Jews were so enraged, that, "if they had known the Christians would have arisen and brought such testimonies from the Scriptures against them they would have made no scruple to have burnt their own Scriptures."—Doct. H. Owen; inquiry, p. 12.

Tertullian, gives the same evidence.

Origen, who flourished in the beginning of this century, and who was one of the most talented of the Christian fathers, unites with the preceding witnesses, and virtually alledges that the Jews had corrupted the Hebrew Scriptures. (See Owen's inquiry, pp. 15–33.

Eusebius, also, who compiled his Ecclesiastical History in the fourth century, refers with approbation to the words of Justin already quoted; saying that he records certain prophetic declarations, in his discussion with Typhon showing that the Jews had expunged them from the Scriptures."—Eusebius' Ecclesiastical History, b. iv. ch 18.

The charge which we have endeavored to substantiate is therefore not new;—it is not now for the first time preferred, eighteen centuries after the alledged event. It was made at the time, was publicly pressed by the most learned of the Christian fathers, and was believed even by Jerome, who manifested great partiality for the Jewish people. We only add, that the conduct of the Jewish rulers gives great countenance to the fact of their guilt; for although their predecessors had publicly approved the Septuagint, they not only condemned it, but promoted three successive translations of the Old Testament into Greek by Aquila, Theodotia, and Symmachus, for the purpose of throwing discredit upon the translation of the LXX., and supplying a version in accordance with their own views.

The Herald of Life.

NEW YORK, AUGUST 9, 1865.

NO IMMORTALITY NOR FUTURE LIFE, EXCEPT IN JESUS CHRIST ALONE, AND BY A RESURRECTION AT THE LAST DAY IF DEAD, OR A CHANGE IF ALIVE.

Our Annual Meeting.

The annual meeting of the "LIFE AND ADVENT UNION" will be held in Rice's Hall, Springfield, Mass., August 25, 1865, at 2 P. M. We trust that all who can, will come and show by their presence their interest in the cause of truth. Never was there a greater need for honest, earnest, persevering effort than at the present moment. The Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ is now, as it ever has been, the great panacea for earthly ills, the great antidote to the poison of Satanic error, the great key to the purposes of God, the great expositor of man's destiny, the great light that pierces the darkness of the valley of the shadow of death and enables us to see our path to a future and eternal life. Can we be too earnest in carrying these glad tidings to our fellow-men? Can we be too anxious that the thousands of our fellow Christians who are led astray by the serpent lie should learn "a more excellent way"? Can we be too uncompromising in our active opposition to that last trick of the devil, which falsely names itself Spiritualism? Let our answer be emphatic. Let all who can, come to our annual meeting, prepared to show their estimation of their responsibility by united action for the systematic spread of the truth.

We have a suggestion to make to those who will not find it practicable to attend the meeting. Let all such who feel disposed write their sentiments, at length or in brief, as the case may be, and send their communications to be read before the meeting. Direct to Joseph T. Curry, Box 393, Springfield, Mass. There is no reason that we should not have a gathering in spirit of every friend of the Life theme. Let us have a load of letters.

And now we commend this and all other schemes for the spread of the Gospel to the prayers of the saints every where. "The fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much."

The Western Mission.

The time for which Br. CAMPBELL went West to labor has fully expired, yet he is still in the work there. Shall this Mission be sustained and continued? We are satisfied it should be, and hope all the friends will be of the same mind. In order for it to be continued, we need more funds. The least we can do is to support Br. Campbell's family, if he is is to remain absent from them. But besides this, he must have papers and tracts to distribute, and he will have other unavoidable expenses in getting over the country. We earnestly appeal, therefore, to all the lovers of the life theme to come forward with their free-will offerings for this special object. We are quite sure the appeal will not be in vain. Let us hear from the willing hearted at once; as it is important to know soon what we can do further for this mission.

RESPONSE TO THE FOREGOING.

GRANVILLE, N. Y., Aug. 4, 1865.

BR. STORRS:—Paper No. 41 came to hand last evening, and your remarks with reference to the "Western Mission" read with much interest. I heartily agree with you that it should be "sustained and continued." All accounts that I have read of Br. Campbell's labors in the West seem to contain the gratifying assurance that MANY—who otherwise would not—are having an opportunity to hear and we may have faith to believe that, through the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, some will come to a knowledge of the truth. There can, therefore, be little doubt that our duty in the matter is to sustain our fellow-laborer there, and his family at home, just so long as he feels able and willing to remain, and they to bear the cross of his continued absence.

"But," you say, "besides this he must have papers and tracts to distribute." Well, send them along, Brother, and let us pray and trust the good Lord to put it into the hearts of whomsoever he will to send the necessary pecuniary aid. He will do it, for truth is his and he will cause it to prosper. He will remember richly and graciously the prayers of those of his servants who love the truth fervently and desire its promotion because it is truth, and not simply because it corresponds with their own views. In the meantime, it is perhaps needless to recommend implicit obedience on the part of all who may feel, even the slightest impressions of duty in the direction of lending their assistance in furthering this excellent work. Enclosed I send $15 for the mission, and trust your appeal will be liberally responded to. Yours in faith,

LEONARD C. THORNE.

Our Mind Expressed by Another.

"We believe in Jesus the Nazarene, crucified dead, buried, rising, ascending, interceding, coming to reign, coming in the clouds of heaven, in the chariots of salvation with the thousands and ten times ten thousand at his feet. We believe in Him, and though unbelief grows bolder and more bold, and pride rears itself more loftily, and unregenerate man strains for Divine power and honors, still do we believe in Christ and in him alone. We will wait with him and for him; and when he comes we will give him a welcome such as earth never has heard. The song of the morning stars shall be forgotten as the song of the redeemed breaks forth with all its accumulating harmonies and 'pure concert.' Yea, angels shall stop to listen, and look down to see the ransomed hosts as they wind up the everlasting hills, and roll forth from vanguard to rear-ward the mighty chorus, 'Glory to the King of kings.' And from eye to eye, and heart, to heart, in all that angelic throng the inspiration shall flash; and they shall catch the strain, and strike all their golden wires, and send back from heaven to earth the thunder peal of praise, 'Glory to the King of kings!' And CHRIST,....the King; Oh, how he will rejoice, for himself and for us! With all the glory on his brow will he look down upon the advancing multitudes, and say, 'Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world.' And when we hear him, again will we cry out and shout, and all heaven shall swell the chorus—Glory to the King of kings!"—Rev. John King Lord, Congregationalist.

Small Business.

FROM LAFAYETTE NORRIS.

CAMPTON, IOWA, July 23, 1865.

BR. STORRS:—The opposition to the truth has culminated in this place to day, by the defamation of your character. You remember I told you in my last, that a neighbor was borrowing books of me, to lend to a preacher, in order to fight the truth. Well, to day the preacher came, a MR. SMITH,—a noted preacher of the Wesleyan Methodist Church. He commenced by giving a short history of you. He said that after your antislavery lectures you turned spiritualist. I told the people of his church, and the opposition generally, that it was false, and that they might as well begin to hunt up their evidence, for I should prove it false and make the matter as public as possible. This Mr. Smith is quite positive, and says he knows your history well. He is an old man.

In talking with DR. LOUDEN, I learned the particulars of the defamation; it is, that you have written Lectures on spiritualism, which have been published by Andrew Jackson Davis. Dr. Louden says, he has seen six lectures written by George Storrs on spiritualism, and for sale by Davis; but he never knew until now that you were the person who wrote them. He says he is going to write to you about the matter, and also send to Davis for the six lectures. Please make some remarks on this subject for the cause of truth in this vicinity, if nothing else.

I preached in Forestville last Saturday, and left another appointment in four weeks. I had a fair sized congregation, and they were attentive hearers. I hope all the brethren and sisters will pray for me; for it is really trying to be singled out and slighted as I am. If Br. Edson Smith will come this way this Fall, I will see that he is helped on his way, and also go to Manchester for him. Manchester is on the Dubuque and Sioux City R. R. If Br. Smith comes he can write me when he will be there.

REMARKS BY THE EDITOR.—Do not be alarm ed, Br. Norris; little minds descend to little things. It is not the first time that men, without arguments to oppose the truth, have cried out, "He hath a devil and is mad: why hear ye him?" If the Wesleyan Minister you speak of had argument he would not need to invent or retail slander. We have never been called a "Spiritualist" before, though we have been often denominated a "Materialist." But it is a matter of perfect indifference to us, personally, what men call us, if it is not worse than "Beelzebub"; and our Master has bid us "rejoice and be exceeding glad, when men shall revile you, and persecute you, and shall say all manner of evil against you falsely, for my sake, for so persecuted they the prophets which were before you."

Really, it is some comfort to be reviled and spoken evil of; and if we only were concerned, it would pass us like the idle wind; but as Br. Norris wishes us to "make some remarks on this subject for the cause of truth in" his "vicinity," we will simply say—We never had even a leaning towards "Spiritualism," and never wrote a line or preached a word on that subject, except to condemn it; and we hope Dr. Louden will help the Wesleyan Methodist Preacher hunt up the "six lectures, by Geo. Storrs, for sale by Andrew Jackson Davis." When that is done, if it proves to be this Geo. Storrs, then we may have to own we have been asleep all our life, and that there is no such thing as matter in the unverse.

We confess we did not think there was ingenuity enough in all our enemies put together, including the chief Devil, to have invented the monstrous lie that Geo. Storrs was ever a "Spiritualist." But marvelous things come to pass in these last days, and things which we thought not of; yet after all, perhaps we ought not to wonder, for "Satan has come down in great wrath knowing that his time is short." His children, therefore, must be expected to be very inventive, and lies must rule the hour, with them; and an apostle has said, "Because they believed not the truth, but had pleasure in unrighteousness, for this cause, God shall send them strong delusion, that they should believe a lie." Lying is the great work of the last-day opposers of the truth.

This Wesleyan Minister says, he "knows" our "history." If that is true, so much the greater sinner is he; for his statement is false, and without a shadow of foundation in truth; and if he does know our history, he knows what he has said of our spiritualism is a bare-faced falsehood. But we hope he will be led to see his error and do works meet for repentance; if he does not, he may as well make himself familiar with Rev. xxi. 8.

As to our friend Dr. Louden, we presume his mistake about the "six lectures" arose from sheer carelessness, when he supposed he saw such "lectures by Geo. Storrs." He doubtless saw our "SIX SERMONS" on the inquiry about immortality, but did not take pains to read them; for if he had he could never have identified them with "Spiritualism" or A. J. Davis. Those Sermons cut up, root and branch, that abominable manifestation, and prove that it is merely the work of the flesh and the devil. If Dr. Louden had read our Six Sermons and subsequent works on man's nature and destiny, he would hardly have written such communications as he is now furnishing for the Herald of Life, presenting arguments which are the very foundation of "Spiritualism," and which have been often answered. Still, in meekness, we wish to instruct those who oppose themselves, even though we must give line upon line in argument.

The Intermediate State.

"We obtain light upon the intermediate state by what is said to Abraham, (Gen. xxv. 8,) 'Then Abraham gave up the ghost, and was gathered to his people.' This, by a superficial reader of the Bible, might be supposed to mean that Abraham's body was buried with his people. But it is not, for his fathers were buried hundreds of miles from him; some in Chaldea; and Terah in Haran, in Mesopotamia, while Abraham was buried in the cave of Machpelah, in Canaan. The sense of the passage is this, that he was gathered to the assembly of the blest, that he went to those good men among his ancestors, who were united to that assembly." G.

It is an easy matter to assume a point; so G. assumes that Abraham had a ghost—a soul, that he gave up to go to his "good fathers." The fact is, so far as Scripture gives us an account of his "fathers," they were all idolaters; and hence he was called to go out from his kindred and his father's house to another land; but it seems G. places him back among them when dead: perhaps they had passed a purgatory and become "good men." Abraham was gathered unto his fathers, without distinction of moral character; and hence he must be in a state involving a common gathering: they were all in heaven or all in hell, if G.'s theory is true; but if all were silent in death, then he could be gathered into the same state.

Let us look at this text and subject a little further. It was Abraham that gave up the ghost. Now if he gave up the ghost then, he —Abraham—had no ghost left. Abraham lost the possession of that which he gave up; so that, if the ghost was his soul, he lost his soul and was without one. The text saith nothing of Abraham's ghost or soul being gathered to his fathers: it was Abraham who was gathered: the same person who gave up the ghost, and not the ghost he gave up. Was the body, Abraham? According to G.'s theory it was the body that gave up the soul; and yet, strange to tell, it was the thing given up, and not he who gave it up, that was gathered to his fathers!

But G. has mangled the text, and put his words in the place of God's words. The text saith—"Abraham gave up the ghost, and died." Abraham was dead; not alive as G. assumes. Besides, the term "gova"—translated ghost—Prof. Pick, in his Bible Student's Concordance, says, is, literally, "wasted away." Abraham was "in a good old age," saith the text, and he "wasted away, and died." How very plain and simple is truth. The term osaph—translated gathered—Prof. Pick gives the literal sense, "to be brought in." Abraham died, and was brought into the state of his people, which was the state of death, where "there is no knowledge."

The same thing is said of Ishmael, verse 17 of the same chapter, as is said of Abraham, viz.: that "he gave up the ghost and died, and was gathered to his people." As nothing very good is recorded of Ishmael, and he did "mock" the child of promise, it is for G. to show that he was a "good man." But whatever his character, he was gathered to the same "people" as Abraham, for all G. can prove to the contrary. Whatever the state of "the people" was, it was a state of death, not life."

FROM W. S. CAMPBELL.

LEWISTOWN, ILLS., July 27, 1865.

I left Br. Lewis at Milton on the 26th and came, on horseback, to Otto for a supply of tracts and our package of extra papers, for the next meeting. We find it very important to have a supply. We get a better access to the people, by this means: it is a continuance of the preaching, at least, for several days. Those who become interested in the exposition they listen to in the meetings, are enabled to continue the inquiry. They get to talking these things over at home; and what is best of all, so many quotations from scripture are given that they commence to look them out, and thus begin the study of the Bible in earnest.

It is amusing to see the pertinacity with which the people adhere to the old fabulous notion of the natural immortality of the soul. It is also pleasing to behold the joy and happiness of some when they discover the true light upon this subject. One man, and he may represent many, who attended our last meeting came to inquire and learn the way more perfectly: he told me that he had never found any one sect with whom he could agree, from the positions taken in respect to man. He could now see the way out of the darkness which had surrounded him, and felt strong in some views of truth which he had himself been able to gather. A very sincere and correct man; he had been counted an infidel or skeptic by the sectarian leaders of this section; and yet different Churches desired him to connect himself with them that they might have the benefit of his influence. Universalism would not satisfy him. Campbellism failed to present the force of the gospel and its saving efficacy. He could handle the most adroit of the teachers who always show their object, as he thought, sooner or later, of building up themselves. "If," said he, "the man is pardoned before he is baptised, why should he be baptised as an act of reconcilliation?" "If he is not pardoned, before; how can an act, which he himself performs—an act of present duty, blot out his past transgressions?"

A very pertinent question too, by the way. How can an act of present obedience atone for what has been committed? Can it remove condemnation for what duties have been omitted? There must be pardon. The atonement of Christ's blood provides for it. No present compliance can remove that record or take away sin. No future conformity, if it were possible, could be taken as an offset to the former disobedience. The idea of substitution and an equivalent, is mischievous. It proceeds too far. Pardon requires faith. The gospel teaches it. Grace provides for it. It honors God. The merit on which forgivness rests is with God. It is divine. To do what is demanded now, will answer now, if it be done aright, in the proper spirit and purpose; but can never remove the claim of the past, nor preclude the demand of the future. No man has done more than his duty before God, at any time. No exemption from penalty can be claimed on the ground of doing what is now called for. Forgivness rests on grace. The duty of the sinner, done well, at any time does not justify him. This must be done by the application of infinite mercy, through the position and intercession of another. If men would but learn that God wishes in the first place to make them right, and righteous in Christ, then keep them right by their conformity through grace; being thus possessed of God's righteousness—the righteousness of faith—they could not, it seems to me, blunder as they do. It is not the ordinances that I object to; it is the employment of them in such manner and with such dependence on the performance as to make them stand, to all intents and purposes, as the carnal observances which are abrogated by the pure and simple law of justification taught in the New Testament.

I have been so fully impressed with the great obstruction to faith, in divine doctrine, since I commenced labor here, that I continually inquire into the reasons why there is so much blindness of mind? To believe aright, requires an examination of the evidence. To see, demands illumination. To feel the force of scriptural inculcation, involves an experience. I find nearly the same want of estimate of the spiritual power of truth, and absence of the conviction of necessary faith, wherever I go. Engagedness is often mistaken for faith and interest. It was confessed by a leading man, (or who would be) in a communion in which baptism, (as I conclude by all that I can find in their teachings) is preaching and conversation, the sine qua non, that if there were any such inward experience as some Christians profess, who believe in the cleansing of the blood of Christ and the influence of the Holy Spirit, he knew nothing of it. He also said, that there was no Spirit, other than that which the word contains. Quite natural this! The position taken by this class of persons is well adapted, or was a few years ago, to the starting of a new sect. How people could have been so much affected by these teachings is only explained by the general neglect of the Bible. I mused as I rode over the rich prairie lands yesterday, and finally through the heavy timbers of Spoon river bottom, on the productiveness of the county; its especial adaptation to particular growths; all things grow rank. A different product, of the same grasses, grains, timbers, &c., from what is seen in the East, even of the same species; and to my mind much of the moral and religious notions of the West are of the same character.

As in the East we are supplied by the immense productiveness of the far West, so it would seem that some very innocent and unsuspecting people, who have long been taught better, have come to receive the dogmas of the West, that they may be supplied with what they lack. Certain it is, that some who were once earnest advocates of the doctrine of justification by faith, now insist upon the virtue of specific acts of obedience.

In the West it is well understood, that most men do only that which is necessary; and generally, for the time being; particularly among the farmers. Hence, they must do a great many things over, very often. Houses, old or cheap, and sometimes very small, and scarcely furnished, will answer for the present (and they may do forever on the same principle) with large farmers and rich men. How the women can live contenedly, I cannot divine, only that some are discouraged, and others have always been used to it.

So with respect to barns. Every thing except in a few instances, is "stacked." The time required to do this, in a year or two, would build barnes and barracks for the crops of wheat and hay, and be a great saving of fodder, to say nothing of the comfort of it, with advantage to stock. But it would be another style of the operation, and to have it done, for good. But can you convince an Illinois farmer that he does not do things in the best way? Not till you convince him that his land is not the best, for that is the great constituent.

I have concluded that they are, theologically, very much so. The work to be done now, it is thought, will do for this time; and no matter for the lesson that is to be learned from the past, or the instructions which admonish of the future. If I see a rich farmer with all the great peculiarities of living, and carrying on his business, which prevail, I do not complain; it is not my matter; but I begin to inquire, what is the prospect of his receiving my ideas. And this is only a thought. There may be ideas which the peculiar characteristics of a community lead them to embrace.

I will say here, that the friends treat me well. They always accommodate the best they can, and I adapt myself to their customs as fully as possible. What else can I do? They are friendly, hospitable, and I hope many of them will receive our views.

By the way, this is the "stacking time;" and for about two weeks, every day but one, it has rained; thus preventing the process, and damaging wheat, (which is growing in the shock) very much indeed.

I am nearly done for this time. I will reserve the remarks upon the importance of tracts and papers to circulate, till the next number, together with a few thoughts upon the necessity of continuing to help in the labor of this great field. If some of the brethren, who wish to improve their gift and preach the gospel of life in Christ only; and who do not know where to "exercise the gift that is in them," were to come this way, they would find plenty of work.

I will just suggest that we might, with a little concert, and with suitable, timely preparation, secure a permanent plan of labor, in the West. Nothing, I think, but the want of means with which to proceed will deter me from the attempt for the future, which I deem essential to the advancement of the cause.

The Lake of Fire.

BY ELD. F. H. BURBANK.

"And death and hell were cast into the lake of fire. This is the second death."—Rev. xx. 14.

It has been a belief generally among our people, that "the lake of fire" will be the present earth in a molten state in the day of our Lord. Gehenna has frequently been referred to as a type of that "lake of fire." My object in writing this article is to show that "the earth in its molten state" is not "the lake of fire" of Revelation.

The nineteenth and twentieth chapters of Revelation embrace a series of events commencing with the judgment of "the great whore," and ending with the casting of death and hell into "the lake of fire." After the fall of Babylon, "the marriage supper of the Lamb" takes place. Next, a terrible battle is fought between "the beast, and the kings of the earth, and their armies," and "him that sat on the horse,....and his army," even the KING OF KINGS with his army "clothed in fine linen, white and clean." Victory turns on the side of the KING OF KINGS. Those who followed the beast were slain with the sword that proceeded out of the mouth of the King of kings. Then the supper of "the great God" took place, for "all the fowls were filled with their flesh," that is, the flesh of the carcasses of the armies of the beast.

The "Beast" and the "false prophet" were not slain, but "both were cast ALIVE into a lake of fire burning with brimstone."

Here we find the first intimation in the Scriptures of "the lake of fire." It is utterly impossible to prove that it is "the earth in its molten state," for whilst the fowls of the air are devouring the flesh of the followers of the beast, the beast and the false prophet are in "the lake of fire" alive. Every one can see that fowls could not eat in a world that was on fire. The supper of the fowls, and the existence of the false prophet in the "lake of fire," are at the same period of time.

All the events we have named occur before the "thousand years" commence. At the commencement of those years, Satan is cast into "the bottomless pit," and kept there a thousand years. During that thousand years, those who had been "beheaded for the witness Christ" reign with him (Christ).

After the thousand years are completed, Satan is loosed from "the bottomless pit," and goes "out to deceive the nations which are in the four quarters of the earth, Gog and Magog, to gather them together to battle; the number of whom is as the sand of the sea." Here is an additional argument against the melted earth as "the lake of fire." The conflict between "the beast" and the "Lord of Hosts" occurred before "the thousand years" commenced. The lake of fire existed there and then. A "thousand years" roll round, and another great battle against the" hosts of the Lord" occurs. The nations that are in the earth furnish the armies, who under the leadership of Satan, compass "the camp of the saints about, and the beloved city." If the earth melted is "the lake of fire," no nations could have power to get together on such a fireball for battle.

As in the war with the beast and his armies, the Lord overthorws in this second great battle, Satan and his armies. The armies of the Devil were devoured by fire, which "came down from God out of heaven.

They were not cast into the lake of fire, but their leader Satan was: for we read, "And the devil that deceived them was cast into the lake of fire and brimstone, where the beast and false prophet (are) and shall be tormented day and night forever." Here we have found the lake of fire in existence throughout a period of over one thousand years. There is a period of time, called "a little season," but long enough to deceive all the nations in the four quarters of the earth, and to make up armies, and gather them together around the camp of the saints, the same saints who had not worshipped the beast and his image over a thousand years previously. Satan does that work, and is overcome, and then cast into the lake of fire and brimstone.

Next in order, "the sea gives up the dead which are in it, and death and hell deliver up the dead which are in them, and they were judged every man according to their works." This judgment takes place after the devil has been cast into the lake of fire." Here another difficulty occurs. If the melted earth is "the lake of fire," where can the ungodly stand, or where can any one else stand to be judged? for it has been asserted that they will stand on the earth, and "call upon rocks and mountains to fall upon them." If "the lake of fire" is really the melted earth, the ungodly would be in "the lake of fire" before they were sent there, which is as directly contrary to the teachings of God's word, as saints going to heaven at death, and being judged afterwards, to see if they were worthy of heaven.

After death and hell have been cast into the lake of fire, all whose names were not found written in the book of life were cast into the lkae of fire. "And death and hell were cast out into the lake of fire: this is the second death."

RECAPITULATION

1. The judgment of Babylon.
2. The marriage supper of the Lamb.
3. The war between "the beast" and the Lord, in which the beast and the false prophet are cast into "the lake of fire," and their armies slain with the sword that proceeded out of the mouth of him that sat on the white horse.
4. The supper of the great God, when the "fowls that fly in the midst of heaven...... eat the flesh of kings, and the flesh of captains, and the flesh of mighty men, and the flesh of horses," etc.
5. An interval of a thousand years, when the saints have peace, and those who had been beheaded lived and reigned with Christ. During this period, Satan is bound in "the bottomless pit."
6. The "little season" next has its fulfilment. In that little season Satan is loosed, and the second war with the saints occurs, resulting in the burning up of the armies of the Devil, and the casting of the Devil into "the lake of fire" to be tormented day and night forever and ever.
7. The sea, death, and hell deliver the dead which were in them.
8. Death and hell cast into "the lake of fire."
9. All not written in the book of life were cast into the lake of fire.
10. New Heaven and new Earth.

My impression, with these facts before me, is, that it is easier to prove the eternal torment of the wicked from these two chapters, than to prove the resurrection and second dying of the ungodly. If "the lake of fire" is not a symbol, eternal torment is true. If it is a symbol, together with "the beast," "false prophet," and "the bottomless pit," then "the second death" is also symbolical language. My conviction is, all are symbols; for the reasons I have given this article for perusal. Yours in Christ.

A Sin to Read the Herald of Life.

BR. STORRS:—Where are we living? In what age are we called upon the stage? What country gave us birth, and claims our citizenship? Is this the evening of the nineteenth century? And are we really living under the influence of Bibles and Christianity? Has inspiration from the realms of the infinite been borne on angel wings to our sincursed earth, and through the lips of God's ministers taught our Anglo-Saxon race to believe that it is a crime to investigate the great truths of the Bible? Has the mighty engine set in motion by the breath of the eternal God, had her wheels cloged by the gospel-peddlers of eighteen hundred and sixty five, so that it is a sin to "prove all things and hold fast that which is good?" Are the great fundamental truths of christianity built upon the sand, so that a few copies of the Herald of Life would undermine its foundation?

I am sorry that those who profess to be disciples of him whose mission it was to liberate the oppressed, have not the moral courage to rise from the loathsome pit of slavery, and walk forth in the sunlight of God's truth. "It is dangerous to introduce the Herald into our family." God pity your ignorance. Do you expect to rear a family under the aggressive light of gospel truth, and keep it ignorant of the great themes of discussion? As well might you attempt to set your foot upon the rising sun, and veil the horizon in one eternal night. When God put the organic elements of our nature in operation, he set a thousand delightful themes before our eyes which he designed that we would pursue, and any attempt to suppress the intellect and growing desire for more knowledge, is an attempt to thwart God's plans, and will prove as fruitless as your effort to nurse into life the twin brothers slavery and superstition. What God has said, hell and devils may oppose with all the backed energies of sectarianism, and he will prevail.

You may crush the light from your son today, and to-morrow he will brake the fetters and join the ranks of infidelity. He knows that God has placed him in a world where all is beauty and grandeur, and where the sublimest truths are written by the finger of the infinite on every rock, and tree, and bud, and petal, and where the Divine signet is placed upon every human character. Words more forcible than human lips can utter tells him that he is the image of his Creator, and if you wish this divine image to remain, feed the intellect. You can nourish the young plant and protect it from the wicked influences of false doctrines and false theories only by making it acquainted with itself, its surroundings, and the Holy Bible. When you teach the child one doctrine respecting the Bible, and then warn it against investigation, you might as well teach the child that you have but little faith in what you have taught it.

I believe, Br. Storrs, that your theory is not a correct one, but how shall I ever know that fact until I have investigated? Ah! never while God leaves my faculties in possession of reason, will I be heard to warn my brethren against free investigation, and if the introduction of the Herald, or any other paper, will offend the body of which I am a member, then I say amputate as soon as possible. "Let my right hand forget her cunning, and my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth" ere I forsake the truth, and bow at a tyrants command Truly Yours.

Ward's Corner, Iowa.

BY W. S. CAMPBELL.

Extract from my Journal, July 29.—I obtained, of a brother at Orro, the same high, hard horse, and borrowing friend Smith's dragoon's saddle and trappings, commenced my journey to the Tent Meeting at Totten Prairie. Smith might have found the saddle very pleasant, (Uncle Sam's latest pattern) but for a Yankee Preacher it was any thing but agreeable. After a seven hours ride, including a halt at Lewistown, to attend to our mail, and another at Br. Loveland's, to bait, I reached the ground: seemingly so remote that we could not expect people to find it; but the congregation was very good.

After preaching to them, in the evening, (I found Brother Lewis going through with a fine view of the sleep of the dead, when I arrived) I returned to Mr. Charles Crandal's, three miles, to lodge. Here, I was well entertained, and most happy to find myself with those who have some ideas corresponding with Eastern people. I have, indeed, found this before; but from my peculiar fatigue, I might have enjoyed it more fully. With Br. Crandal it is not all the world to have land, but a quiet, intelligent, and interesting home is a great aim.

July 30.—I rode to the ground in the morning. Found the people gathering, and found myself very much stirred in my spirit to speak to them the words of life eternal. We had a large audience; good attention and deep interest. Many found the foundation of natural immortality shaking beneath their feet. To some, the doctrines we held forth were entirely new. Several ministers were present. One Methodist, one United Brethren, and two Campbellites. We formed an acquaintance with Mr. Wafdel, a Methodist minister, who listened with the greatest interest, and appeared very well satisfied with our positions. Some found fault; but, generally, the people were awakened to the truth, and will search the word to find whether these things are so

Our preaching was on the plan of God. Of course, we spake a long time in each sermon, and without notes; (as ever, out here) but none were fatigued, only the speaker who was well overcome with the heat. They called for more of the same, and reminded me of those brethren mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles, who wished for another Sabbath's labor among them. It was a trial to leave them; but we found that to get ourselves, the Tent, and our effects to Lewistown in season to leave for the meeting in Macoupin Co. the first Sunday in August, we should be obliged to strike our tabernacle, and leave the place in the evening. The seed has been sown up there, on the Prairie; and we hope some fruit will follow.

July 31.—Last evening, in thirty minutes after service, our meeting house was in a big lumber wagon, and ourselves aboard, on the way to Father Crandal's. Here we found that truly Christian entertainment which is so gratifying and useful to a minister after labor. These friends are from the East, formerly. They are intelligent, engaged, earnest christians, with whom it is a comfort to meet and rejoice in hope. They seem to appreciate more fully those things which people value in the Eastern country. We hope to meet them again, if not in the present world, yet in the coming dispensation. They are Seventh-day Adventists. We have now reached Br. Webster's, at Milton, where we are, as we have often been before, most kindly and hospitably put up. They are engaged in the cause which we came here to advocate; though they are members of the Methodist Church. Sister Webster—an excellent singer, with ever a most exalting, animating song of praise, with the soul full of the spirit of it—seems to have a heaven around her. She is deeply interested in the work of the Lord, and wishes to labor more fully in the Master's vineyard.

Br. Loveland has done us great service in these last two meetings. He is a brother, beloved, interested in the cause; and we feel under great obligation to him. May the Lord reward him. The weather came off clear, on Friday; hence, we have escaped any detention from the wet, and can be expeditious in getting down to Hornsby. We ship the Tent to-day; ourselves, on Wednesday. But as what we do, by the Divine blessing, will be done before this reaches your readers, it is of no consequence to report the record of intentions.

There is a charm about preaching to our brethren, and others, in the West.

Luther on Things to Come.

(From Muerer's "Life of Luther," pp. 572–574.)

Once as his little dog was begging before the table, some one proposed the question, whether there would also be irrational animals in yonder world as there are in this? "As suredly," said he, "for the new Heaven and earth will not be desolate and waste, but filled with beautiful creatures. The redeemed from among men will be adorned with true and perfect wisdom, righteousness, splendor and glory of the Lord Christ, which as yet no eye hath seen, nor ear heard, and no heart conceived."

In the year 1541, when, during a very beautiful spring, everything flourished and bloomed, Luther said to Justus Jonas, "If only sin and death were absent, we would be satisfied with such a paradise. But it will be much more beautiful when the world and the old state of things will be entirely renovated, and an eternal spring begin, which will be and continue forever."

The computation of those who confidently fixed the year and the day of the final judgment being once referred to, he said, "No, verily, the text is too plain in Matthew xxiv. Concerning the day and the hour knoweth no man, no, not the angels in heaven, but alone my Father; therefore neither I, nor any man, nor angel, can fix the day or the hour. I believe, nevertheless, that all the signs which are to precede the last day have already happened. The Gospel is preached throughout the world; the child of perdition is revealed, and destroyed in the hearts of many; the kingdom of Rome is declining to its fall; all the elements and creatures are in commotion, and declining; there is no longer any love or fidelity on earth, and Christ may come when he may, he will find but a small flock of believers; excess in eating and drinking, the practice of usury, anxious cares, covetousness, extravagance in dress and building, and all manner of irregularity, verily being as prevalent now as they were at the times of Noah; wherefore I conceive that the signs preceding the last day are fulfilled. Unless it should be that Gog and Magog, together with the Papacy, should yet be crushed and destroyed previously, in a temporal respect, too, and that particular and supernatural darkness should perhaps be witnessed in the sun and moon, as was the case at the death of Christ, and that the Gospel should, previously to the last day, be banished from all churches, schools, and pulpits, and be found only with pious heads of families, within their four walls, as it was at the times of Elijah, and as it verily almost seems it will be now. Otherwise, everything is fulfilled which is to precede the last day. Methinks Christ our Lord is already publishing His summons in heaven, and the angels are preparing for the journey, and because during these six hundred years all the great and marvellous events of which Elijah prophesied have occurred in the spring and about Easter, I trust Christ will also appear about Easter, and cause His voice and thunder to be heard in a morning tempest, and then with one stroke, confounding the heavens and the earth, in a moment of time transform the living, raise the dead, create a new heaven and earth, hold His judgment in the clouds, wholly fulfil the Scriptures, together with His last: It is finished; this we await."

The Spirit's Work.

I never saw or felt the importance of the Spirit's work on my heart as I have since I was led to see that there is no hope of being revived from the dead unless we are connected with the great LIFE-GIVER, who will give life to those that believe in him. The evidence to my mind is conclusive that the great principles laid down in the word of God entirely exclude those who have not the Spirit of Christ from a resurrection from the dead; therefore the words of eternal truth come home to my heart with a force that I never experienced before, and I rejoice very often in secret meditation, that my Father in heaven has led me into such glorious liberty as I have enjoyed since the light first broke into my mind. Praise the Lord, for his goodness endureth forever.

And now I want to speak of the work of the Spirit in developing christian character. In Rom. v. 3, and onward, we have this language, "And not only so, but we glory in tribulation also, knowing" there was something to be accomplished. What a singular expression. He gloried in tribulation. To understand this great work we will go back to the history of the Apostle when he started to go to Damascus on his persecuting voyage. Think you that he could then glory in tribulation as he states it in this verse? I think not; for if he could aid in the death of so good a man as St. Stephen, he had none of the Spirit of Christ. But after the light of heaven shone round about him, he saw his wretched condition, and cries out, What wilt thou have me to do? He receives his instructions from the Saviour's own lips; and after he recovered from the shock which he received from the light which appeared, and the Holy Spirit had purged out that spirit of malice, then he began to see the importance of the christian character which is developed in the scripture I have quoted; and he now glories in tribulation. It is evident that there is a working process by which patience is worked out, and it will take one's life time to work out all the Christian graces. I have often seen brethren and those whom we esteem as good, who would let angry passions rise. Hold, Br.! Tribulation will work out patience, and patience will lead to an unshaken reliance on eternal truth, and angry passions will cease. If patience maintains her noble position, there has been one great point gained in Christian character.

I will leave this point and come to the next. We have patience mastered. It commences working out experience, which is the ground work of hope; for we could not give a good reason for our hope without experience to back it up. To illustrate. I being a machinist, if I should go to seek employment, the very first question that would be asked, would be, How much experience have you had in the business? If I had not had a good experience, I would not have hoped to obtain employment. Christian experience works out hope, which is the sweet consolation and crowning blessing of the three great principles which have worked out this glorious hope, and has interwoven a christian character, that hope is not ashamed of; because the love of God is shed abroad in the heart by the Holy Spirit which is given unto you. Yours in hope of life in Christ alone.

Letters and Extracts.

From Mrs. E. C. M. Boyd.

BELOVED ONES OF THE "CHESNUT TREE" COMPANY, and others who love the "Life" doctrine: —I often look for letters from some of you in the "Herald;" occasionally one greets my eye, and my heart is rejoiced.

Of late, there seems to be improvement in this direction. Sister Helen R. has made known her whereabouts, physical and spiritual; a word from Sister L. J. Beach informs us that she still lives;—Bro. W. S. C. keeps us informed of the progress of the "Western Mission"—May God prosper it!—Br. R. W. gives a word of cheer for the Mission, and of thanks for Br. Thorne's letter—in which he speaks for us all: but where is Br. Bishop? and has Sr. B. no more songs of "Life in the future" for us? Where Br. Denny, and Sister Naomie, and dear Marie S.—whose five years sojourn in the Holy Land could afford so many reminiscences, interesting to all the readers of the Herald,—and many others, from whom we would so gladly hear? Will they not respond?

I have been asked why I do not write. I am sure, if any word of mine could comfort any of the "tried" ones, as I have been comforted by others, it should not be kept back; nor has it been from absence of will or desire to write, but because my mind and time have been so occupied with other necessary interests, that I have not before contributed my "mite."

Now, having a few weeks since left my home in the "City of Brotherly Love,"—towards which my heart often turns in longing interest for the little church there,—I find myself in dear old Massachusetts, breathing her pure air and enjoying the society of loved friends.

The glorious scenery of hill and valley, forest and village, mountain and cultivated fields; whose summer stillness is frequently disturbed by long, dark, moving lines, accompanied by clouds of smoke—in their swift movements indicating the progress of the age; aiding the "many" to "run to and fro"—carrying also the mails, which bear to loved ones widely separated, those precious messages and words of love that cheer the hours of otherwise lonely absence—this is the prospect that daily meets my eye.

I am writing from my father's residence in Groton Junction, where we had expected to enjoy a camp meeting the ensuing fall, but which has been for good reasons, doubtless, given up.

Many of us feel disappointed, for we had hoped to meet together and strengthen and exhort each other, speaking of the things of the kingdom, the blessings of the way, the sustaining grace in trials, and the hope of soon coming glory.

Now, beloved ones, I would think that we might impart some blessing each to the other if we would speak through the paper words of consolation, exhortation and comfort.

We cannot all write scripture expositions or make chronological calculations—or bring out labored arguments or logical essays; but we can write of the love of God if we have it in our hearts; we can tell of the work of that love—its glorious work in us to purify and prepare us for the nearing kingdom; and these are the witnesses which we all love to read.

All have not the same gift. How was it with the apostles? Paul, with the sword of the Spirit laying bare the weakness and poverty of the law, made known the riches of "the ministration of the Spirit" which giveth life in "weighty and powerful" letters "in which are things hard to be understood." James, reproving the rich and the unbelieving, and criticising generally, might be thought something of a faultfinder. Peter, not "negligent always to put in remembrance the things that pertain to life and godliness," spake of the promise of "the new heavens and new earth;" while John, the beloved, writing to the little children that their "joy might be full" declaring "the things which he had seen and heard" made the sum and substance of his letter. "Beloved, let us love one another: for love is of God: and every one that loveth is born of God and knoweth God. He that loveth not, knoweth not God: for God is love." Do we not all prize the letters of this loving and beloved disciple?

So let us write, manifesting our love to each other in a willingness to share the consolations of this gospel of love; knowing that "we have passed from death unto life because we love the brethren."

The church still has its Pauls and Peters James, and oh, we know there are the Johns, and the Marys, and women which labor in the gospel, whose names are in the book of life—and we love to hear from them all.

Let Paul examine the relative position of Jew and Gentile; and James criticise the faith and the works of his Brethren; and Peter testify to the "coming of the day of God" and the speedy establishment of the new order, stirring up "pure minds by way of remembrance;" but John will not, can not be silent when his heart is so full of the love of God that he must declare it that we may have fellowship with him; while Mary will "bring he disciples word" of a risen Jesus; and Martha too,—though careful and troubled sometimes, being a good housekeeper, and anxious to serve the saints—shall rejoice to declare her hope of a resurrection of loved ones "in the last day." Oh, let all the gifts be used. We certainly have the matter in the heart—God has given talent and ability to manifest it. Let us comfort one another with the comfort wherewith we ourselves "are comforted of God."

From Helen Robertson.

NIAGARA FALLS, Aug. 3, 1865.

BR. STORRS:—Last eve at ten o'clock I left Utica for Wisconsin, to visit my father and other relations there. It is nearly nine years since I have seen them, and now feel the Lord is opening my way to go and visit at this time. I go with the prayer that my Father in heaven may give me wisdom, patience and a spirit of faithfulness while I sojourn among them What a change since I left them Then I believed in the immortality of the soul, going to heaven at death, eternal torments, &c., &c.; now I see these are only human traditions and superstitious fancies, not the pure teachings of the Scriptures of truth. No: they teach that man was made of the dust of the ground, the breath of life breathed into his nostrils and he became a living soul. No immortal soul then. That when Jesus comes the sleepers in the dust of the earth shall awake; so they cannot have gone to heaven; and that the enemies of the Lord shall perish. To perish does not mean burning in fire and brimstone to all eternity. What a change! What a relief! Yes, and plain Scripture teaching too. I thank God. He is a God of love and infinite mercy.

This morning I have reached Niagara Falls, and am writing this in full view of them. And O, how magnificently grand! I cannot describe them. Would that you and all the dear readers of the Herald were only here this gloriously bright, healthful, cloudless morning, to see them for yourselves. I know you would all enjoy it; and it would be like the kingdom for me to be surrounded by the loved ones in the Lord, in addition to this pure, heavenly atmosphere and picturesque scenery.

There are two grand divisions of the Falls. One comes straight down, and is formed something like a horse-shoe: the other flows in from the American side. One part of it protrudes, and another goes in. The spray rises up so beautifully veiling the whole. There is a bright rainbow too, adding grace to the scenery. The immense body of water dashes over furiously, but immediately below there is almost a dead stillness: Just as if stupefied by its dreadful fall and stopped a little to get breath, recover itself, and then proceed more cautiously. What a splendid place this would be for a camp-meeting, and I trust we shall soon encamp along with our Lord and Master when He takes the kingdom.

Here I shall leave you for the present, intending you shall hear from me as I progress on my journey. Let us pray for each other. And O, let us be faithful unto the end, so that we may get the crown of life.

Your Sister in hope of life through Christ.

ELD. KINGMAN D. OAKES, Bridgewater, Aroostook Co., Me., writes:—I have moved from St. Albans to this place. I am thankful for the HERALD OF LIFE, and do not know how to do without it, for I feel it is a true teacher of Bible truth. I am glad I have learned there is no future life out of Christ—that he is the LIFE-GIVER from the dead. I wish I had some money to send to pay for the paper; but I have none; yet I would like to have its visits and will do what I can for the spread of its truths. There is a large field here for labor; the doctrine we preach is new among this people, and the old church people oppose it much; yet there are some who embrace the truth as it is in God's word. I am glad the truth will stand when heaven and earth pass away.

FOR SALE AT THIS OFFICE.

On all books and pamphlets sent by mail the postage has to be pre-paid.

SIX SERMONS on the inquiry, Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the Life-giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by GEO. STORRS; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This word contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in plain binding, 50 cents; in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near ten years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER: OR, MAN IN DEATH; AND THE HOPE FOR A FUTURE LIFE.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead, can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none there fore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD; OR, THE RIGHTEOUS ONLY WILL LIVE AGAIN, By GEO. STORRS. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonise, but is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the EDITOR of the HERALD OF LIFE. Price, $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.—IMMORTALITY: The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev, T. M. Post, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by GEO. STORRS. Price in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. POST, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a Prize Essay on IMMORTALITY, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men, with ut egard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. POST took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The REVIEWER followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The Author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

BIBLE VS. TRADITION: in which the True Teaching of the Bible is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity Life, Death, &c. Price, bound, $1. Postage 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. It is a work of much labor and research. The title indicates its object, and the performance shows the object was kept in view throughout. The language is sometimes severe on what is called "orthodoxy —more so than is desirable—but the value of the work, in general, cannot be over-estimated. Thousands of it have been sent abroad, and thousand more ought to be scattered. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subjects; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

SONG OF A THOUSAND.

BY HENRY C. WORK.

Lift up your eyes, desponding freemen!
Fling to the winds your needless fears!
He who unfurled your beauteous banner,
Says it shall wave a thousand years!

CHORUS—A thousand years! my own Columbia!
'Tis the glad day so long foretold;
'Tis the glad morn whose early twilight
Washington saw in times of old.

What if the clouds, one little moment,
Hide the blue sky where morn appears—
When the bright sun, that tints them crimson,
Rises to shine a thousand years?

Tell the great world these blessed tidings!
Yes, and be sure the bond-men hear;
Tell the oppressed of every nation,
Jubilee lasts a thousand years.

Envious foes, beyond the ocean!
Little we heed your threatning sneers;
Little will they—our children's children—
When you are gone a thousand years.

Rebels at home! go hide your faces—
Weep for your crimes with bitter tears;
You could not bind the blessed daylight,
Though you should strive a thousand years.

Back to your dens, ye secret traitors!
Down, to your degraded spheres:
Ere the first blaze of dazzling sunshine
Shortens your lives a thousand years.

Haste thee along, thou glorious noon day!
Oh, for the eyes of ancient seers!
Oh, for the faith of him who reckons
Each of his days a thousand years!

A WHITE MOUNTAIN ADVENTURE.

Charlie, our minister's little boy, was once the hero of a very startling adventure.

I will relate it for you, dear children, and I hope your fathers and mothers too, will be interested in my true story, which is to teach you that your very lives may depend on your instant obedience to their commands. When Charlie was five years old, he and his brother John two years older, accompanied their father and mother on a journey to the White Mountains. [They are in the northern part of New Hampshire.—EDITOR.] The family did not travel by cars and stage, but in their good old fashioned way, with their own horse and carriage.

We find our travellers one bright summer morning among the Franconia mountains. They had spent the previous night at the Flume House, and were now pursuing their journey to the Franconia Notch. As they rode quietly along, mamma consulted the guide book, (Eastman's White Mountain Guide,) and they read and talked of the profile (old man of the mountain) and the crystal mirror (lake) at his feet, of echo lake, too, and the many, many wonders and beauties of the Notch, which they had almost reached.

"And here," said mamma, laughingly, as she turned the leaves of the book, "right here in these woods somewhere, it must mean, is another wonder—a wonder of both nature and art—so it seems."

"Read it to us! read it to us!" cried the boys. So mamma read.

"About two and a half miles southward of the Profile House, is Walker's Observatory. A tall pine, standing by the side of the road, possessing wonderful capabilities as an observatory, was brought to its fated end by trimming away the branches, and fastening an easy succession of winding stairs around its trunk. As the tree is strong, and well secured by iron chains, we may feel reasonably safe in ascending to the look out on the top. A really commanding view is obtained from this half natural, and half artificial observatory. From no other place in the lowland can you obtain so good a view of the valley between the mountain ranges."

"Oh, here it is!" said papa, "is it best to stop?"

"Do! Oh please do stop!" shouted the boys.

"Well we will," said their father, "for the boys will never forget it." "Ho! Charlie, boy, was there ever such a famous tree to climb?"

Now, as I said, Charlie is the hero of my story, so I must tell you more of him. First since it has to do with my story, he was a wonderful climber, and had been, through all the eventful five years of his life; having, on hands and knees, mounted to the third story of the great hall at grandfather's, long before he could go alone. For all he was a great brave boy, he was still "the baby;" soft, white, rosy, curly-headed, and as full of dimples, and fond cuddling ways, as ever was mother's baby.

When, the previous evening, all radiant from his excursion to the Flume, he ran, for the first time, into the parlor at the Flume House, one of the group assembled there exclaimed:

"Oh, you little curly headed angel! where did you come from?"

So at once he was their pet, and the pet of the house. Dark-eyed Johnnie, who was mother's companion and confidant, ever devoted and true, won golden opinions from all; but Charlie was the pet; father's, mother's every body's pet.

So our party came to the foot of the tree.

"Charlie boy is such a brave climber," said mamma, "I suppose he will be at the top first of all."

All cast a fond look on the boy, who already in advance, turned his bright face all aglow with happy excitement upon them. Oh, had that look been the last!

So they wound their way slowly up, Charlie just in advance, (so they thought) talking of the scenery, and answering Johnie's thoughtful and over-mature questions; winding round and round, up, up, up—Charlie just round the turn, out of sight, yet near—

Oh no! Oh terror! up in the dizzy air, above the tops of the highest trees, there is a cry, a gasping, faltering, frightened cry—trying still to be brave.

"Mamma, where are you? Every thing goes round up here."

"You are only dizzy, my darling, sit right down on the stair; don't step, don't step, sit right down." So went up mother's answer from white lips, and an agonized heart, yet to a mother's instinct, loud, clear, and cheerful as a bell.

Up sped the father, crying out encouragingly:

"Good Charlie, sit still, papa is coming."

What a sight met his view as he reached his boy, and clasping him to his heart, shouted, back, "all safe!"

Yes, all safe sat the boy, right on the outer edge of a stair just where the broken railing gave no protection, more than a hundred feet from the rocks below, his cheeks aglow, his eyes agleam, his red lips parted in happy smiles, obediently waiting his father's coming steps; wondering the while what "dizzy" was, to make the world go round like a top.

Yes, he was safe, because unquestioningly obedient, he sat right down without taking another step, on the verge of the yawning death chasm, safe! One step—one effort to go down, to do anything, but just what he was bidden, and oh what tongue can tell the horror of the results. We will not imagine. That fearful death plunge, that crushed and lifeless mass, the agony of those hearts, smitten by a great life sorrow. It is enough that God was merciful.

How joyfully our travellers arose, when their heads and steps were once more steady, and went up the few remaining steps to the top. Charlie first and highest of all, mounted on his father's shoulders. How gratefully they went their way. Yet the mother's heart was shrouded in a mist of penitential self-reproach, and that night as she knelt by the couch of her darlings, nestling in their sweet sleep together, she prayed:

"Yes, Oh, my God, a mother may forget her boy; but Thou, Oh bless Jesus, never, never wilt Thou forget."—Congregationalist.

EVIDENCES OF IMMORTALITY. — NO. 2.

BY E. B. LOUDEN, M. D.

BR. STORRS:—You will please excuse my delay in sending this article. Having been severely afflicted with sore eyes, I have been unable to write. I am intending to send you a club of subscribers to the Herald of Life. I recommend your paper on account of its liberality. Always stand by the motto, "free discussion," and you will secure the approbation of all good and true men and women. It is not probable that you will ever make me a disciple of your faith, but in purpose I think we are the same.

My friend J. T. C., in reply to evidences No. 1, stated that there was no religious journal on his side that had ever refused a hearing on both sides. He is certainly mistaken. I am now in possession of a letter written by a prominent Editor in Boston refusing to hear but one side. He says, "Our readers are nearly all satisfied that the wicked will be finally destroyed as the Bible affirms, and would not like to have the columns of our paper filled with articles advocating the doctrine of eternal torment." The date of this letter is March 31st 1865. I do not introduce this as argument in this discussion. It was with the best of feelings that I received the above refusal, being similar to the treatment that I have received from our own papers. I offer it here only to show friend C. his mistake, and that before he commences to throw stones he had better get out ofglass houses.

Br. C. dissents from my proposition in No. 1 to receive the Bible as it is. He says "our present translation is in the main an excellent one, but in many cases it is probably erroneous." Now, I wish to know if this proposition will be accepted. I am dealing with the Bible as published in the English language. As for the mistakes that my friend finds in the Bible, I am not responsible, and I have not the least doubt but that if his translation could be received it would be much easier for him to prove his doctrine. I shall not deviate from my proposition until my friend admits that his position cannot be maintained by the Bible as it is. I wish to know whether we have a Bible published in the English language or not. If we have we must certainly abide by it. I do not say that I will not engage in an examination of the original, but my friend must first condede that I have the argument when the Bible is received as it is now published. I will pay no attention to any reference that may be made to the original until the book as we have it is disposed of.

A few points in my friend's argument deserves a brief notice. He says, "Our friend (referring to myself) seeks to get rid of the obsatcle (i. e., Adam failing to die at the time threatened) by inventing a theory of 'Spiritual death' which runs counter to the whole Bible." If he thinks this "spiritual death" is a new invention, will he please tell us what kind of a death the prodigal son died, when he forsook his fathers house? Luke xv. 24. "For this my son was dead, and is alive again; he was lost and is found," &c. This is a parable, but what is the design but to represent a real death? Eph. v. 14, "Wherefore he saith Awake thou that sleepeth and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light." What kind of death were the Gentiles here required to arise from? Were they physically dead? Rom. xi. 15, "For if the casting away of them be the reconciling of the world, what shall the receiving of them be but life from the dead." Will my friend please answer the Apostle's question in this text? Rom. viii. 6, "To be carnally minded is death; but to be spiritually minded is life." Is the carnal mind unconscious? Eph. ii. 1, "And you hath he quickened who were dead in trespasses and in sins;.... Even when we were dead in sins, hath he quickened us together with Christ." Is it an unconscious state to be dead in trespasses and in sins, and were the individuals to whom this language was addressed in an unconscious state? Col. iii. 3, "For ye are dead and your life is hid with Christ in God." Is God here talking to dead men, destitute of consciousness? There is not one word said about physical death in any of these passages, yet my friend contends that physical death is meant all the time. Will he explain it? Let me here caution him to remember his own words that "it is better to leave a problem unsolved than to deny the first principles of revealed truth."

The holiness of Adam before the fall is denied. Gen. i. 26, we learn that Adam was created in the image and likeness of God. Now, was that image and likeness a holy one? It cannot be that it is man's physical organization that bore the image of his Creator, because God is said to be "without body and parts." "God is a spirit," &c., &c, is the language of scripture. Our friend says, Adam was a "mortal man in an immortal residence." Will he please tell where that residence is located? He says, I "will not deny the literality of the resurrection." I will leave the resurrection just where the Bible places it. 1Cor. xv. 44, "It is sown a natural body it is raised a spiritual body." There is a natural body, and there is a spiritual body. If it can be shown that our literal bodies are spiritual bodies, of course I will believe it.

Our friend denies tha was the "mission of Christ to restore t the human race what was lost in Adam." He repeats my text in Matt. xviii. 11, and reads it thus; "For the Son of man came to save that which is lost;" and then adds, "but not what was lost in Adam." Now, that is precisely the way the text reads, and my friend knew that he was misquoting when he substituted "is" for "was." His comments show that this was done intentionally. What reliance can be placed upon a translation made by one who will change the plain letter of the Bible in order to help his side. The text reads, "For the Son of man come to save that which was lost." This is the declared mission of Christ. The loss here evidently refers to the fall of man through Adam. Then it adds "for as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive." What more is Christ than the "resurrection and the life?" Had Adam never sinned would God ever have executed the sentence, and had the sentence never been executed would Adam not have remained eternally in the same state? He had access to the tree of life. What more will the christian get through Christ?

In article No. 1, I introduced Bible to prove that man is a compound of soul, body, and spirit. This I believe has not been denied by my opponent. In this article I shall proceed to show that the soul, body, and spirit, as mentioned in Thess. v. 23, can be separated—that one is subject to death without exposing the other. As evidence I will introduce Matt. x. 28, "Fear not them who kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul, but rather fear him who is able to destroy both soul and body in hell." This passage plainly declares that the life of the body is in the hands of one who is not able to kill the soul, or "cast both soul and body in hell." There can be no mistake in this language. I do not design to show by this text that the soul will not be destroyed, but that the soul and body are distinct entities not depending upon each other for life. Again I will cite to Luke xii. 4. "Be not afraid of them that kill the body, and after that have no more that they can do." This is certainly sufficient to establish this proposition.

Man, then, being divided into a compound of soul, body, and spirit, we will proceed to notice his death as the consequences of Adam's transgression. 1 Cor. xv. 22 is sufficient to show that all die the same death that was passed upon Adam. Friend C. objects to calling that a spiritual death. He may name it just what he chooses, and I will proceed to show that it was not a natural death such as seems to be the common lot of all flesh. Turn to Gen. iii. 19 and you will see the first account of Adam's death. It reads, "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread, till thou return unto the ground, for out of it wast thou taken; for dust thou art and unto dust shalt thou return." This is speaking of Adam as a natural being subject to a natural death. Not one word is said about Adam's returning to the ground in consequence of sin, or the transgression of law, but the reason is assigned in the text. "For out of it (the ground) wast thou taken." Had Adam not been taken out of the ground it is probable that he never would have returned to the ground. If man dies a natural death in consequence of sin, the Bible is silent on that point of revealed truth. God does not leave man to guess at such important facts. All flesh is the same in its origin, composed of the same law of decomposition. There is no flesh exempt from the law of natural death, and yet we do not find anywhere in the Bible that the animal dies in consequence of a broken law.

Let us look at the death threatened Adam in the sense of annihilation. "And Adam lived nine hundred and thirty years and died." That is, was annihilated. Rom. v. 12, "Wherefore as by one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin, and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned." Now, if death means annihilation we will read this text in its true sense. "Wherefore as by one man sin entered into the world, and annihilation by sin, and so annihilation passed upon all men, for all have sinned." We will now read John v. 24 in the same sense. "Verily verily I say unto you, he that heareth my word and believeth on him that sent me, hath everlasting life, and shall not come into condemnation; but is passed from annihilation unto life." Mark, this does not say will pass from annihilation unto life, but it is something that has already taken place. 1 John iii. 14, "We know that we have passed from annihilation unto life because we love the brethren." How will friend C. get along with this class of believers. They have once been annihilated and have passed that great ordeal. They are no longer subject to the law of death, or annihilation, and consequently will never experience what we call death. It is evident that this rendering of the Bible will never answer. We must take God at his word. When he says we "have passed from death unto life," we understand that he means just what he says. Every christian can understand this when he experiences the forgivness of sins; sin is death and pardon is life. We obtain pardon through Christ, and they that believe on him have obtained this blessing. Christ is the only source of salvation, and hence, they that do not believe on him will never be benefited by his death. The Bible teaches that all men are dead, (not will be dead,) who have not the benefits of Christ. This is proved by Rom. v. 12. We learn by this text that sin is the door to death, and that all have sinned, and therefore all have passed through the door. And from John v. 24, we learn that Christ is the door to life, and they that believe on him have likewise passed through that door, and hence, have life. There is nothing in the future about this. It does not speak of an immortality that is to be given, but it is something that is already obtained.

In my next I will proceed to show that a conscious immortality will be the lot of all human creatures, without regard to moral character. I use the word immortality in the sense of positive identity without reference to a state of happines or misery. Truly your Br. in Christ.

Ward's Corner, Iowa.

RESPONSE.

We plead—Not guilty, to the charge of "throwing stones." In our friend's first article he commenced thus: "The opening of your paper to the discussion of this question is an evidence of more liberality and desire for truth than is generally manifested by Editors of religious journals. A one-sided discussion seems to be the policy of all sectarian bodies." We inferred from this, that our friend supposed that our paper had not always been open to the discussion of the question. To show our position—not to "throw stones"—we replied,—"This is not a new thing with us. For more than twenty years the advocates of immortality only in Christ have been just as free. They have always evinced a readiness to hear all the arguments brought against them. No religious journal on our side of the question has ever acted otherwise; so that our friend's just remark only rebukes the 'religious journals' of his own belief. He cannot find a single periodical of his own denomination that dares to discuss this question."

Now we fail to see that our remarks differed in substance from the affirmative's except in this, that we would not allow that our side was rebuked. The well-known fact that the periodicals on our side of the question have been filled, year in and year out, with the discussion on both sides, warranted our words. His own side was alone guilty on this point. If there was any stone thrown, it was by our friend himself. He made the charge and we allowed it as far as we deemed it true.

Of course, we were not aware of the fact now stated by our friend in relation to the "Boston Editor." We argued from known facts. We have kept a bright look out on the conduct of the various journals that advocate our view of immortality, and this is the first case of the kind that has come to our notice; whereas the journals on our friend's side are uniformly, and so far as we are acquainted, invariably hostile to the discussion of the question. And well they may be, for the "scrutinizing pen of free investigation would instantly exhibit to the gaze of an astonished world the most pernicious" falsehood that was ever uttered.

As for the "Boston Editor," we are sorry to hear such a report of him as Dr. Louden gives; but we can in no way be responsible for his course. Certainly the Herald of Life has no sympathy with it.

It is unnecessary for our friend to enlarge on the merits of the original. He gave his opinion in his first article. We merely expressed our opinion in two lines. It will be soon enough to take this point up, when we are driven to it by the argument on the main question. We can assure him that the common translation establishes our views. We have not yet made any statement on the original that will not be allowed by critics on all sides; hence he need not "throw stones" at us for "rectifying mistakes."

The remarks on "spiritual death" in this article are further fetched than those in the first. We said in our previous response, "Until we are furnished with Bible evidence of such a death, we deny it." Six texts are now quoted, with the remark,—"There is not one word said about physical death in any of these passages; yet my friend contends that physical death is meant all the time." Again we plead—Not guilty. We do not contend for nor believe it. We never had the slightest idea in that direction. Physical death is not referred to in any of the texts. But if physical death is not spoken of, how much less is "spiritual death", meant. We repeat our declaration: there is no such thing as "spiritual death" in the universe. The phrase is a misnomer. It is impossible to link "spiritual" with "death." We might as well say "divine death." One of our friend's texts is against himself. "To be spiritually minded is life." But according to his notion, it would be just as proper to say—To be spiritually minded is death. He believes in spiritual death just as much as he does in spiritual life. Now we believe in the latter, but deny the former. We say again, let him prove that there is such a thing as spiritual death. There are two natures in God's plan; an animal nature and a spiritual nature. Corresponding to these, there are two lives—an animal life, and a spiritual life. The first is subject to death, but the other is not; hence we say, there is no such thing as spiritual death.

If we are asked to explain the sense in which the term "death" is used in the six texts, we answer—In a figurative sense. The prodigal son was figuratively dead. To his father he was "lost," "dead;" but when he returned home, he was "found," "alive." The term is figuratively used; but it is based on physical death. If there were no physical death, there could be no figurative death. Still we ask our friend to give us evidence of "spiritual death."

The original holiness of Adam is again referred to, but no proof is yet given. Our friend says that Adam being created in the image of God, was therefore holy. That depends altogether on the previous question, Does the fact that Adam was created in the image of God prove that he was like God in every respect? Until our friend affirms, he fails to prove the original holiness of Adam; for if he was not like God in every respect, then, he may not have been like him in holiness. We still wait for evidence.

With regard to our mis-quotation of Matt. xviii. 11 our friend throws a big stone. We are charged with making an intentional misquotation. What does our friend take us to be? Suppose we should say that he made an intentional misquotation in his remark that God is "without body and parts." The phrase is not in the Bible, although our friend engaged to "base his arguments upon Bible authority." And wherever he took it from, he has misquoted it. Let us have no more such attacks, but give us the argument for man's natural immortality. We know there is no proof of it.

We repeat, that although "the Son of man came to save that which was lost," he did not come to save that which was lost in Adam. The context shows that the Saviour is speaking of lost men, who are to be 'saved' from perishing "in their own corruption." Our friend asks "What more is Christ than the 'resurrection and the life?'" We answer,—Adam lost his animal life, but Christ came to bring spiritual, immortal life by a resurrection. He does not restore what Adam lost, but brings in something better.

Matt. x. 28 is again quoted. Our friend says, "I do not design to show by this text that the soul will not be destroyed." Well you may not design it, for the text positively declares that it can be destroyed, and in a certain contingency, viz., where the natural man fails to receive God's Spirit, it will be destroyed. Now the question at issue is, Is man immortal without regard to moral character? And the very first text quoted by our friend utterly annihilates the affirmative. Let our friend answer this text if he can.

Our friend's next paragraph, beginning "Man, then, being divided," is more than covered by our argument on the death penalty in our first response. We gave abundant proof that the death is natural and literal. That evidence our friend has not noticed, and we do not blame him, for it is unanswerable.

The attempt to substitute "Annihilation" for "death" in certain texts is lost time. We do not believe that "death" means "annihilation." It means "death." And our friend has not yet proved the contrary.

In his last paragraph we have the promise of an argument. Send it along. We defy the world to prove "that a conscious immortality will be the lot of all human creatures without regard to moral character." J. T. C.

A REMARKABLE PROPHECY.

Not long ago was found at Toledo, in Spain, in a monastery, a paper containing the following prophecy:

"In the far west, beyond the ocean, will be a nation which will be great in power and wealth, and Satan, in one of his walks to and, fro in the earth, will observe this nation, and determined to destroy their happiness, will there send two monsters, one to the North and the other to the South, and he will give them strawberries, and after they have eaten they will feel a great thirst, not to be quenched by anything but blood.

"They will, therefore, cause the brother to slay the brother, the father to slay the son, and the son the father; and they will drink the blood of the slain, and it will bring lamentation and wailing throughout the land. And when the time is fulfilled, there will rise a strong man in the north, and will take the monsters, and bind them, and will draw them into the sea where it is the deepest, and peace and happiness will again prevail throughout, and the people will praise the Lord."

It is said the monks in said monastery maintain that the prophecy was written before the discovery of America by Christopher Columbus; that Ferdinand and Isabella were in the main induced by it to fit out the ship for Columbus; that the first part is fulfilled in America and that the other will soon come to pass.—Prophetic Times.

We rather think this and similar "prophecies" were "written" near the present time, and are as worthless as any other vagaries of Romanists and fancy dealers. Some people can never be satisfied with plain matter of fact, but must have something marvelous; and what they lack in the real, they make up with fancy, wishing to be thought wise above their fellows. We have had quite too much of this imposition from those who seek to make capital for themselves by speculating on the credutity of honest and simple minded people. Sober truth, such as abounds in the Bible, needs none of these fanciful dreams and imaginary prophets. The only effect such trash has, is, in the end, to bring reproach on the truth and serves to lead men to discredit the Bible testimonies themselves. Give us the "Thus saith the LORD" and we can well afford to leave all such prophecies as the above to the superstitious, or such as walk by the senses, and not by faith.—EDITOR OF THE HERALD OF LIFE.

We republished it, believing it could not fail to interest all thinking men, whatever might be thought of the accuracy of its positions. For ourself, we indorse the general theory that the Anglo-Saxons are the literal descendants of Israel, in the line of Joseph and Ephraim. Price, 50 cents, in paper covers only. Postage 6 cents.

A WESTERN RIDE.

FROM W. S. CAMPBELL: ANOTHER EXTRACT FROM HIS JOURNAL.

SPRINGFIELD, ILL., Aug. 3, 1865.

Well, the people wished us to stay and hold other meetings, in that part of Fulton Co. Some were very earnest, even claiming we were not doing right to leave when there was such a desire to hear; but we had engaged to be in Macoupin Co. next Saturday and Sunday; therefore, we struck the Tent, and on Tuesday shipped it from Lewistown.

Wednesday, August 2. At 8:40 we left Brown's with one horse, packed with saddle-bags, carpet-bags, etc., and with one man riding and the other trudging on foot, we proceeded down through the bluffs to the Illinois bottom, which is four miles wide at this point—and sometimes overflowed—where we found the mud, some of the way, about over shoes. At 11:45 we came to the river: heard the whistle blow at Havanna, and knew that the only opportunity of leaving that day, was about to leave us. Br. Lewis said, "too late." I said, "We'll try!" In a moment, I "unpacked my mule," and at "double quick" we sprung to the bank. The ferry boat was there, but too slow, for they "rope it over." "Step into this skiff." We did so, and as the train stayed "a good bit," for dinner, we got aboard in time. It was so excessively hot, we were "powerful weak." The conductor just said "half price, for you two preachers." It was kind of him. A ride of forty miles brought us to Virginia, a town on the Prairie, through a most splended country, the most interesting portion of which is the Sangamon prairie; then crossing a dismal lagoon, including the Sangamon creek, we came to a tract which, from its broken character, reminded me much of some parts of New England.

At 2 o'clock we left the train; backed our "dunage" to the "stage office," half a mile, and elected to go across the country, 32 miles, to Springfield, this evening. There stood at the door the stage; which means a "hack;" and, which is a lumber box, on springs, and covered; with a "power" of team in the form of two "old pelters," and a driver who "allowed to drive" as well as any one who ever went over a prairie road; but who made but very poor time. The great rains had left the roads bad; the small bridges were breken up. We drove through the Creeks and "slews" lumbering along; but through a most admirable country ot prairie farms. The "routes" were deep—we broke down before we got half way. "Power of misfortune, that a stage like that, should not hold to get to Springfield." Surely it was to us! Arrived at Pleasant Plains, a village more "bluffy" than level, and noted, so far as we could discover, for the residence of the celebrated eccentric Preacher, Peter Cartright, whom they said was "right smart o' preacher," in his old age.

We got our supper. The young man who appeared to be the clerk, knew "Pap Lewis." They received some papers and tracts, and wished us to stop there and preach, or come again as soon as we could. The lady who did the honors of the tea and coffee was a little inclined to show how religious the people were, she being a Presbyterian, "now of a long time;" but finally admitted that "it looked like it would take a heap of preaching to put people back where they were before." They reduced our bill.

Seven o'clock P. M. We took our next stage (a substantial two horse wagon, of the heavy kind, without spring or seat except a board across) for a fifteen mile ride. Our supplementary Jehu did honor to his prototype. Never was less regard paid to ruts, mud holes, planks over sluices, stumps, and gullies. Through timber and over prairie we drove. A prairie ride by moonlight! Was ever any jaunt more grand? I wished—as we passed the farms, the cornfields, stretching away for miles, the long lines of Osage Orange hedge, the groves, so sublime; beautiful farm houses, then the murmuring creek—I wished I had been born a poet. Did my friends ever try it? If they have as I did, and were not "Moon struck" they must have been "struck" with the vast scene of loveliness and sublimity, and often struck by the wagon jumping over a cross log.

We put up at Father Maxcy's in Springfield, at 10 P. M.

Aug. 3. We are both so lame to-day that it is painful to move about; but we have visited at Br. Wise's, called upon Dr. Helm, and also upon Dr. Wardner, with whom we had a very interesting conversation. Found some interest in the coming of Christ. We were received cordially.

THE ADVENT DOCTRINE.

The Bible throughout directs our faith and hope to a coming restitution of all things. As there is salvation for the individual through Christ, so is there redemption for the race. The Word of God teaches that his purpose of redemption comprehends all human relations, and even the physical system to which they belong. We are right, therefore, in looking for a time when not only man, but all human systems, social, governmental, will be perfect. The kingdoms of this world are to become the kingdoms of Christ and of his saints. A commonwealth, whose metropolis is the eternal city of the heavens, is to rule and possess all things. All Christians agree in these general statements. But all do not perceive that the divine plan necessitates the repudiation of all existing systems, because, like the individuals that design and compose them, they are corrupt and worthless, and the revelation of a new system from above. Christians hug the vain delusion of a possible regeneration of society, and of the human fabric through the improvement of existing forms, thus belying the testimony of God concerning them, and emasculating the Church's hope of that divine system He has promised to reveal at the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ with all his saints.

Even as far back as Abraham, God's plan seems to have been better understood than now. He evidently did not expect the promises to be fulfilled to him until after resurrection. He looked for that city which is to come, and that divine commonwealth of the future in which the saints of God, the dead and the living, should be gathered to enjoy the blessing of that happy time of restitution of which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his prophets since the world began.

Hence he confessed himself a stranger and a pilgrim here, his citizenship in heaven. But most Christians, nowadays, look for a millennium on the earth before resurrection....

We wish now to bring out the truth, that those who look for a millennium on the earth, before the coming of Christ and the resurrection of the saints, fail to perceive a most vital point of Christian doctrine, viz., that redemption is not possible for man, or for the race, except by a previous repudiation and new creation. "As the body is dead because of sin," so are all existing systems of society incapable and worthless. They cannot be carried over into the new order of things to come. As individuals cannot be saved without regeneration, no more can the world be saved without resurrection. There must be a new and holy nation "manifested," of men created anew in Christ Jesus, a new type of humanity prepared to administer the authority and blessings of the new kingdom. Any other doctrine than this proceeds upon a false conception of what man is by nature, and all the organizations of men, the states and empires of this world. The depravity of the individual must inhere in the mass. And if the old nature of the man be set aside and put into the place of death, so must all the commercial, social, and even ecclesiastical fabrics of man's devising be shaken down, to make room for that kingdom which cannot be moved. But it is asked if the majority of those that compose a state become regenerated, or if Christians be raised to its posts of authority and influence, will not the improvement for which we hope be at least begun? We reply, the Christian scheme is not to improve, but to reject the old and create the new.

The individual believer is taught that his old nature is to be kept in the place of crucifixion, and to earnestly look and patiently wait for the time of deliverance from it, when Christ shall appear, and he shall be like Him. So are we taught that all systems erected on the platform of this present evil world partake of its evil, that their proper end is destruction, that our hope for the world is not to be realized in this way, but in the manifestations of a celestial polity, a city which hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God. The divine plan, as revealed even to the patriarchs, for the world's redemption, turns upon resurrection. The preaching of Christ raised from the dead, by the apostles, had this meaning. And for Christians now to virtually set aside the testimony, by looking for a golden age on the earth, before the coming of Christ to raise the just, looking to present systems as adequate thereto, is a grievous departure from the faith once delivered to the saints.

And here we see why the doctrine of the resurrection and the second coming of Christ is displaced, in modern preaching, from the prominence given it in apostolic times. Another hope, a false hope, a delusion of the wicked one, has been substituted,—a hope that makes the Church and the Christian more content with this world, and less earnest for that to come. And we need not wonder that the doctrine of the new birth is so universally despised or ignored. If society is to be sacred without God's plan of resurrection, why not the individual without regeneration?

If this world can be improved into a millennium, why may not the natural man be cultured and made fit for heaven?

And hence the almost universal sentiment, but feebly rebuked by the Church, that if a man is good by nature, and acts his part well in society, he is safe enough for the future.

Surely a reformer, a good citizen, who does much for the improvement of his fellow-men, needs no other passport to heaven. If the Church knew and looked for the only way in which this longed-for improvement is possible, if she knew the meaning and the power of Christ's death and resurrection, if she would turn away from idols and vain ideals to serve the living God, and to wait for his Son from heaven, her testimony for the great cardinal facts and doctrines of his word would not be so confused and so easily set aside.

We discover then here the great reason why the doctrine of Christ's second coming is so unpopular. It is unpopular with the world for precisely the same reasons that the Gospel of the grace of God is not popular. We have seen that this Gospel condemns man, and makes him entirely dependent on God. It humbles nature and self in the dust. The natural man does not like this. He hates it, and will hate it to the end, unless God gives him a new heart. So does the world hate a doctrine which proclaims the worthlessness of all human systems, which declares that all its proud fabrics are built on a rotten foundation, and must totter to their fall. The hardest thing for man to learn is to give up all self esteem and self trust, tobe saved as a pure act of grace. So it is impossible for the world to give up admiring its own schemes, boasting of its achievements, and confiding in its own resources. The god of this world will not suffer this until he is "bound," nor will the world be convinced until the destructive judgments of that day in which every one that is proud and lofty shall be humbled, and the Lord alone exalted. But why is this doctrine so generally rejected by the professing Church? The only reply to this is, because in these last times she is in awful alliance with the world She is developed, in the first place, in great ecclesiastical systems, which are, more or less, connected with the State, and whose prosperity and perpetuity are partly, at least, identified with it. And then, again, the pride which is native in every human breast, is constantly appealed to and gratified in the endeavor to build up these systems, and to accomplish through them the promised reformation.

Even Christians cannot readily receive a testimony which requires that all their systems be also set aside. They admire their own great fabrics as do the world, and are led to acquiesce in the same delusion that the Lord can accomplish his work through them without coming to erect, on their ruins, his own holier temple. Not only all the great empires of the world, but that great spiritual confederation, styled in the prophetic Scriptures Babylon, and all those church systems that partake of her spirit, and mark out the earth for their inheritance, attempting to realize the kingdom of Christ on earth, without waiting for his appearing, shall be thrown down. Hence, of all churches, that of Rome has been most persistent and bitter in opposing the true doctrine of that blessed hope.

In brief, it may be laid down as a general principle that the more worldly a church or a Christian, the less inclined to this doctrine. It is a protest against the world, against human nature in its present depraved form, against society, governments, and, for the most part, churches, as at present constituted. It proclaims the necessity and gives the promise of something better. Of course, the more one finds the present system of things congenial to his tastes, the more he suffers it to become the theatre for his covetousness or ambition, the less he desires the coming of another. We repeat, then, this doctrine is unpopular for precisely the same reasons that the doctrines of grace are unpopular. It condemns man, his vain theories, and self-sufficient efforts, and imposing systems. The preaching of the coming of the Lord is a constant protest against them. It proclaims their insufficiency and inherent weakness. It declares that they are built upon the sand, that the finger of God has already inscribed them for destruction. It pronounces all the world's apparent success in self-aggrandizement, temporary and unreal, needful discipline indeed, but destined to end in failure, that so it may be prepared to receive and rejoice in that salvation to be revealed when the desire of all nations shall come.

It follows, from what has been said, that there is a wide, if not an essential difference in the faith of Christians, as they stand related to this doctrine. One's view of it modifies his whole conception of the Christian scheme. It is usual for Christians who reject this doctrine to tolerate it in their brethren as a harmless conceit. But, if true, it is vital. If we are right, they are fearfully wrong. Their entire conception of the doctrine of Christ, of the present relation of the Church to the world, is vitiated. If this doctrine be true, to deny it, is to be led astray by the error of the wicked. We cannot, therefore, have the charity for their views they profess for ours. The two systems diverge at the very first principles of Christian doctrine. The individual is but the microcosm of the race. If the gradual improvement theory be correct, it can be applied to one as well as the other. If the promised "regeneration" of society and of the race can be accomplished before the resurrection of the just, then why may not the individual be regenerated without partaking of Christ's risen life? If it be the divine method to leaven all existing forms, without the revelation of a new, then is the sanctification of the individual not a casting off, a crucifixion of the old man, and a creation of the new, but its improvement. The faith of God as to this matter is, that as the Christian is to count himself "dead" in the old life, his new life hidden with Christ in God, and to be manifested at his appearing, so must he regard all the outward forms the world takes on its states and empires, as put into the place of death in Christ's death to be thrown off as effete and worthless at his appearing, and that this event is its only true hope. For the Christian to be diverted from this hope by the world's vain theories of progress and reform, is to miss the meaning of God's testimony as to the world's condition and capabilities, and as to His one and only method of salvation.—Prophetic Times.

But, thirdly, a brief reference to some few passages of holy writ, and an examination of the published opinions of the Jewish elders, will fully confirm the view which has been taken on this subject. We do not propose to institute a comparison between the conflicting readings found in the Hebrew and Greek versions, any further than may be necessary to our immediate object.

We refer first to Luke xxvii. 4. It is plain that, after the Israelites had crossed Jordon, Jehovah commanded an altar to be built on one of two mountains. Ebal or Gerizim. At present Ebal is found in the Hebrew, Gerizim in the Samaritan. We need not now explain the strong national animosity involved in this question. Here a word is evidently changed for a particular purpose.

On whichever of the parties the criminality rests, it was committed by those who professed the utmost religious veneration for the Pentateuch. The alteration must have been intentional. Here, then, we have an evident instance of the crime which we are investigating. After the elaborate scrutiny of Dr. Kennicott, few persons will doubt the accuracy of the present Samaritan text in this particlar. On this, however, we do not insist; but maintain that here is an actual corruption of the sacred text made by the Jews for party purposes.

It will be necessary, however, to cite some instances which bear directly upon our argument; and Dr. Owen has collected some of a startling character. We refer to Isaiah xlix. 6, which is quoted Acts xiii. 47. The learned writer observes: "The point was this: When the Jews opposed the doctrine of St. Paul, and disdainfully rejected the offer of the gospel, he plainly told them that he would thenceforth turn to the Gentiles; not out of any resentment for the ill usage he had received from them, but in obediance to Christ's command, and for the accomplishment of the prophecy, 'I will set thee for a light to the Gentiles, that thou mayest be for salvation unto the ends of the earth.' The Greek words in the Acts agree with the Septuagint; but the later Jews omitted the caph at the end of the first word, and added a jot to the end of the other, and thereby formed the present reading; which, literally translated, means, 'that my salvation may be extended to the ends of the earth;' that is, as they interpret the words, that the Jewish dispensation, often called 'the salvation of God,' may spread far and wide, and that proselytes may be gathered to it out of every nation and kingdom of the world; an interpretation suitable, indeed, to the notions of the Jews, but quite contrary to the doctrine of the apostle, and to the purpose for which he quoted the text."—Dr. Owen's Inquiry, pp. 70–72. The Septuagint still retains the passage in precise agreement with the Apostle's quotation.

We now direct attention to the same author's remarks on Amos ix. 11, 12, quoted Acts xv. 16, 17: "After this I will return, and will build up again the tabernacle of David, which is fallen down; yea, I will build again the ruins thereof, and I will set it up: that the residue of men may seek after the Lord; even all the Gentiles, upon whom my name is called, saith the Lord, who doeth all these things." The original has precisely the same terms as the Septuagint, and it is evident that this reading at that time agreed with the Hebrew; and it is evident, if this reading had not been the true one, the Jews of that time, who were so violently prejudiced against the consequence drawn from it, would never have been determined by it. But determined by it they were; and therefore stand, in this dispute, on the side of the apostle against their descendants. For their descendants, resolutely bent on maintaining their opinions at all adventures, have since corrupted the text; and by reducing it to the form it is in at present, have made it speak the following sentiment: 'That they,' namely the Jews, 'may possess, or rule over, the remnant of Edom, and all the heathen,' &c., a fine complement to themselves, at the expense of the apostle's judgment."—Ibid. p. 69, (see Doct. Clarke's Com., Acts. xv. 16, 17.)

The same writer cites another passage to the same effect: "St. Paul, in Rom. xv. 10, quotes Deut. xxxii. 43: 'Rejoice ye Gentiles, with his people;' which perfectly agrees with the Septuagint. The Hebrew is, however, altered so as to read, 'Praise, ye Gentiles, his People.'"—Ibid, p. 85.

The same text has suffered more violence than even that which has been just mentioned; for in Heb. i. 6, we have this very important quatation: "When he bringeth in his first begotten into the world, he saith, And let all the angels of God worship him." The margin very properly refers us to this passage, Deut. xxxii. 43, which, in the Septuagint, has the exact words: they are now completely expunged from the Hebrew text.—See Dr. A. Clarke's Com. Heb. i. 6.

Again: St. Paul, in Heb. x. 5, "Wherefore, when he cometh into the world, he saith, Sacrifice, and offering thou wouldest not, but a body hast thou prepared me." The Septuagint version of Psalm xl. 6–8, agrees with this; yet the Hebrew, by a very slight alteration of letters, is now made to read, "My ears hast thou opened," instead of, "A body hast thou prepared me."—See Dr. A. Clarke's Com. Heb. x. 5.

Passing over other cases which deserve attention, we satisfy ourselves with referring to Dr. Owen's remarks on Jer. xi. 19: "The Septuagint reading is, 'I was like an innocent lamb, led to the slaughter:' all the other versions concur in the same sense. The Hebrew is, however, so altered, that at present it reads, 'I am like a lamb, an ox shall be led to the slaughter.' This corruption we may charge on the Jews with more confidence, because the text, in conjunction with its parallel, Isa. liii. 7, bore so hard upon them, that, having nothing to answer, they betook themselves to blasphemy, and from blasphemy to forgery the transition is easy."—Dr. Owen's Inquiry, p. 64.

These are not cases of mere various readings: such as are to be found in the Hebrew, and still more frequently in the Septuagint: but the passages to which we have referred, exhibit, without doubt, an intentional alteration of important texts, which, in their original purity, gave the clearest testimony to the sufferings of the Saviour and the calling of the Gentiles; and which, for the purpose of supporting the christian cause, were triumphantly quoted by the inspired writers. Hence the case became desperate; and the alteration of the obnoxious texts was resorted to as the only means of resisting the truth. [See more ample proof in Whitaker, Arianism, Dr. Owen's Inquiry, and Dr. Adam Clarke's works, Vol. 10, pp. 136–144.]

We are aware that many persons will receive the evidence we have adduced with extreme caution: especially those who have been taught to believe that the Jews have uniformly entertained unbounded reverence for the Old Testament Scriptures. For the information of such, we may strenghten what has been advanced, by briefly showing that this veneration has, in a great measure, vanished under the influence of an inveterate opposition to Christianity.

As an indubitable proof on this point, we observe, that the Babylonish Talmud positively asserts, "that it is right and lawful to take away one letter from the law, that the name of God may be publicly sanctified, or may not be publicly profaned!" The writings of the rabbis abound with proofs that this pernicious principle was not allowed to remain a dead letter; numerons are the texts which their pupils were taught to alter and to modify to their own views, under their direction, "Read not so, but so." Above all, we have the conduct and revealed judgment of the Jewish elders. They virtually set aside the Scriptures by the formal introduction of the Cabbala. This Cabbala is comprised in the Talmud, and consists of two parts—the Mishna and the Gemara. These the rabbis greatly preferred before the Scriptures; and hence their proverbal estimate of written books: "The Mikdarb" (or Old Testament) "is like water; the Mishua like wine; and the Gemara" more plain and perfect "like hippruas" or the richest wines. (See Whitaker's Origin of Arianism, pp. 115, note.)

Although we have been compelled to be brief in the selection of evidence, we incline, to think that enough has been adduced to prove, that, in cases of extremity, and when influenced by strong national or religious prejudice, the Jewish elders did not scruple to alter passages in the Old Testament, so as to make them read more favorably to their own views. We have now to show that they had this motive for altering the chronology of the early ages, in order to present a chain of evidence on this important subject.

THE MODERN MARTYR SPIRIT.

You hardly anywhere have a record of persecution to death, but there you find side by side with the record of those who were enabled to be faithful, a record of others who recanted. In our own Reformation, perhaps the most beautiful and devout spirit that graced it was that of Bilney, who was converted to God along with Latimer; but even Bilney, when placed before the array of power, shrank from the fiery trial, though he afterwards challenged it, and bore it with a martyr's firmness. Cranner, too, the founder of the church of England—a man of God, I hold him to have been, notwithstanding all that Lord Macauly has said of him—he had his weakness, for he recanted again and again; and it is expecting too much of human nature to expect that a fiery trial of that kind should come up anywhere without there being instances of such infirmity. But, somehow, it has happened that in the accounts which we have had of the persecutions in Madagascar, there is not a single record of recantation. Is not this very remarkable? You see the Christians hunted through city and wilderness; you see them driven away from home, and all the endearing connections of home; you see them shaken with terror as they think of the physical torture that must come upon those from whom they are separated; you see them in chains and dungeons, and torture; you look at them as they are hurled from the rock, or transfixed with the spears, or burnt to death; but their God will not allow them to recant. These are experiences that have been permitted in the providence of Heaven to the infant church of Madagascar. —Dr. Vaughan.

LIGHT IN DARK PLACES.

PASSAGES IN THE LIFE OF A CITY MISSIONARY

In these dark places are found some of God's most precious jewels. Brightened by life's roughness, they appear ready to shine in the Redeemer's crown. Never before have we witnessed such entire devotion, such perfect trust, or such cheerful acquiescence to the Divine will. There are cases when to live and suffer is more heroic than to die. And here, unknown but not unloved, suffering but still supported, you may find greater heroes than are held up for the world's applause.

A year ago a pious German died, leaving his wife and little children only a good name and the gracious promises of the widow's God. The anniversary of his death seemed to shade the homes of the bereft ones with unwonted gloom. Active memories only brought larger measures of sorrow in exchange for the happiness which appeared so bright because forever fled. True, for a long, dark year, the everlasting arms had been an unfailing support, and from the treasures of God's mercy a sure supply had come. But now, as if for an increased trial of faith, her means failed, and at night they had lain down without food.

A few days before, burdened with a knowledge of this case but unable to relieve it, we had, unknown to the family, addressed a note to a wealthy and benevolent gentleman, stating the facts as above noted and asking for a barrel of flour.

The poor woman came to our office, and, sitting at the desk, while tears coursed their way down her face, she said, "I am so happy this morning!"

"Why are you happy?"

"Last night I went to bed with a very heavy heart. There was not a morsel in the house for the children. Falling asleep, I thought the Bible was open before me, and I read—'The Lord is my Shepherd; I shall not want. He maketh me to lie nown in green pastures; He leadeth me beside the still waters; He restoreth my soul; He leadeth me in the paths of righteousness for his name sake.' This morning a gentleman called, and, after making many inquiries, asked if I would like a barrel of flour. I told him I knew of nothing that would benefit me more. He replied that he would send me one, as he really thought I was in want. The barrel of flour has come."

Thus, through one of his children, did God signally answer the faithful prayer of another. —The Methodist.

EARLY INSTRUCTIONS REVIVED.

CONVERSION OF JOHN. B. GOUGH.

I remember myself the days of Sabbath school instruction. I remember the teachings of a praying, pious mother. That mother was very poor, but she was one of the Lord Jesus Christ's nobility, and she had a patent signed and sealed with his blood. She died a pauper, and was buried without a shroud and without a prayer; but she left her children the legacy of a mother's prayers, and the Lord God Almighty was the executor of her last will and testament. That mother taught me to pray; and in early life I had acquired the habit of praying. She, with the assistance of teachers in the Sabbath-school, had helped to store my mind with passages of Scripture. And we do not forget that which we learn. It may be buried—it may be hid away in some obscure corner of the heart; but, by and by, circumstances will reveal to us the fact that we know much more than we dreamed we knew. After that mother's death I went out into the world; exposed to temptation I fell; I acquired bad habits; for seven years of my life I wandered over God's beautiful earth like an unblessed spirit, wandering, whipped, over burning desert, digging deep wells to quench my thirst, and bringing up the hot, dry sand. The livery of my master had become to me a garment of burning poison, bound with the fetters of evil habit—evil habit like an iron net encircling me in its folds—facinated with my bondage, and yet with a desire—oh, how fervent!—to stand where I had once hoped to stand. Seven years of darkness, seven years of dissipation, seven years of sin! There I stood.

"Ah," says one, "what is the effect now of a mother's teaching and of a mother's prayers—of Sabbath-school instruction, and of your good habits that you formed in early life?" Oh! I stood there—I remember it well—feeling my own weakness, feeling that "the way of transgressor is hard," and that "the wages of sin is death," feeling in my heart of hearts all the bitterness that arises from the consciousness of powers that God had given to me wasted, conscious that I had been chasing the bubble pleasure, and finding nothing—gaining nothing by it—there I stood! That mother had passed away. But was her influence lost? No. As I stood, feeling my own weakness, knowing that I could not resist temptation, it seemed as if the very light she had left as she passed had spanned the dark gap of seven years of sin and dissipation, and struck the heart and opened it. I felt utterly my own weakness, and the passages of Scripture that were stored away in my mind—buried, as it were, in the memory—came as if whispered again by the loving lips of that mother into my ear. "He is able to save to the uttermost." That is what I want. I want to be saved—I cannot save myself—"save to the uttermost." "Him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out." This was the force and influence of a mother's teaching. It was the force, as it were, of a good habit that had been utterly broken up and destroyed by the acquisition of the evil habits of sin.—

John B. Gough, on "Habit."

Self-Control.

A merchant in London had a dispute with a Quaker respecting the settlement of an account. The merchant was determined to bring the account into Court, a proceeding which the Quaker earnestly deprecated, using every argument in his power to convince the merchant of his error but the latter was inflexible.

Desirous to make a last effort, the Quaker called at his house one morning, and inquired of the servant if his master was at home. The merchant hearing the inquiry, and knowing the voice, called out from the top of the stairs, "Tell that rascal I am not at home." The Quaker looking up to him, camly said: "Well, friend, God put thee in a better mind."

The merchant, struck afterward with the meekness of the reply, and having more deliberately investigated the matter, became convinced that the Quaker was right, and that he was wrong. He requested to see him, and after acknowledging his error, he said: "I have one question to ask—How were you able, with such patience, on various occasions, to bear my abuse?"

"Friend," replied the Quaker, "I will tell thee. I was naturally as hot and violent as thou art. I knew that to indulge this temper was sinful, and I found it was imprudent. I observed that men in a passion always spoke aloud; and I thought if I could control my voice, I should repress my passion. I have, therefore, made it a rule never to let my voice rise above a certain key; and, by the careful observance of this rule, I have by the blessing of God, entirely mastered my natural temper."

The Quaker reasoned philosophically, and the merchant, as every one else may do, benefitted by his example.

Greed of Gold.—When Napolean, about 1811, desired to build a palace for the King of Rome, near the Barriere de Passy, the shop of a poor cobbler, named Simon, stood in the way. Simon having learned what was going on, demanded twenty thousand francs for his tenement. The administrator hesitated a few days, and then decided to give it; but Simon, goaded by the love of gain, now asked forty thousand francs. This sum was more than two hundred times its value, and the demand was scouted. An attempt was made to change the frontage, but being found impossible, they went again to the cobbler, who had raised his price to sixty thousand francs. He was offered fifty thousand, but refused. The Emperor would not give a franc more, and preferred to change his plans. The speculating son of St. Crispin then saw his mistake, and offered his property for fifty thousand francs, forty thousand, thirty thousand, coming down at last to ten thousand. The disasters of 1814 happened, and all thoughts of a palace for the King of Rome were abandoned. Some months after, Simon sold his shop for one hundered and fifty francs, and in a few days after the sale was removed to an insane asylum; disappointed avarice had driven him crazy.

Responsibilities.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. He often differs from them; but believes in a free exchange of thoughts. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not: he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

The Herald of Life.

NEW YORK, AUGUST 16, 1865.

NO IMMORTALITY NOR FUTURE LIFE, EXCEPT IN JESUS CHRIST ALONE, AND BY A RESURRECTION AT THE LAST DAY IF DEAD, OR A CHANGE IF ALIVE.

Various Matters.

Next week the annual meeting of the Life and Advent Union is to take place at Springfield, Mass. There will be no issue of the Herald of Life that week; nor, probably, any the week following; partly from the absence of some of our working force from the office, and to give time for putting things in order for a vigorous prosecution of our work the coming year. The next paper, therefore, need not be looked for till Sept. 6. Let this be kept in mind by our subscribers and it will save them and us trouble. No one need surmise that because we pass over two weeks there is any fear of a permanent suspension or discontinuance of the Herald of Life. Our friends know its value and importance too well to indulge such a thought for a moment. Yet we have exhausted, on the present volume, all the money received from subscribers and from donations, and more also. But this is not a matter of discouragement. Every unpopular cause has had to struggle through just such difficulties; and this struggle was anticipated by the friends of "Life only in Christ" before they began the work of issuing a paper. Nor do they feel like relinquishing their object because it costs something to sustain it. No: "onward" is still the word; and onward we shall go, by the blessing of God: that blessing has been a marked one hitherto.

Let us renew our work at and after our annual meeting. Let all whom God has prospered take hold with grateful hearts that they are permitted to labor in word or deed in this cause. The final triumph of the grand and glorious truth of Life only in Christ is not a matter of doubt in the minds of its friends; but the efficiency with which we take hold of and prosecute the work will show our love for and confidence in this truth. If some few forsake us because they cannot have every thing and every word in the paper just as is to their liking, that is no matter of discouragement. When had the cause of truth no deserters, or none whose hearts did not faint because of the trials of the way? It has been so under all dispensations, and in all ages, as the history of ancient Israel and the history of the Apostles abundantly show. God said to Israel, "When thou goest out to battle.... the officers shall speak and say,.... What man is there that is faint-hearted? let him go and return unto his house, lest his brethren's heart faint as well as his heart." In obedience to this command, Gideon, when he was going out to battle against the Midianites, made the proclamation, "and there returned of the people twenty and two thousand, and there remained ten thousand." More than two thirds of the whole army left. Still the Lord said to Gideon, "The people are yet too many"; and another test was instituted which left only three hundred; yet these were sufficient, under the cry of "The sword of the Lord, and of Gideon," to overthrow and utterly destroy the vast army of the Midianites.

Shall we faint or be discouraged, then, seeing it is not by might nor by numbers we are to prevail, but by God's word and Spirit we are to expect success? Let our friends be strong in the Lord and in the power of his might; so shall we not labor in vain nor spend our strength and means for naught. Let the faint-hearted go, if they will; but let men and women who mean to stand for God, and the truth of Life in Christ alone, gird on their armor anew, and anew consecrate themselves and their means to spread abroad this saving and cheering truth.

The field enlarges before us. While we would not overlook or disregard the work to be done in the East, we must remember the West and South are opening for us, and Ethiopia is stretching out her hands for "the water of life." Shall any who have the love of God, and of the truth with which we are put in trust, think of withholding any thing it is in our power to do to carry the life message to dying men, and for the comfort of God's children, who have, these long years, groaned under the harrowing and horrible doctrine of endless or hopeless torment for lost sinners? Are we not thankful that our eyes have been opened to another and a more honorable view of God's designs towards the creatures of his power? How many have praised God for this deliverance. Shall we not help others into the same blessed liberty? Shall we live like other mere worldlings or worldly professors of religion? Shall it be our great concern to lay up treasures on earth? or, seek our own, and not the things that are Jesus Christ's?

Alas for us, if we are content to share the glory and the bliss of such glorious truth as God has given us, without showing our gratitude to the Author by spreading it abroad to others. Where is our love to men, if we can hoard up such precious light of life from those who are in daily agony for the lack of it, or perishing because left in darkness by our neglect to do all we can to enlighten them?

Come one and all who love "Life only in Christ;" let us look to God, and ask ourselves, as in His sight, What more can we do to spread abroad the light of life? Have we done all we could? and are we persevering in the good work? or, do we let some differences among us, on other topics, turn us away from yielding a full and hearty support to this work committed to us? Shall we bestow our means to aid those who oppose this truth, because some things are said or done by some among us that we do not approve? Do you not find those others advocating things you can not agree with? and, also, reviling the truth of Life only in Christ, which you so highly prize? Why then not act in a manner that shall demonstrate you are in earnest, and let all know that if they would have support from you in their publications they must cease to revile the truth of life only in Christ? or, at least, treat those with christian respect who believe it?

There is no such thing as putting our light under a bushel and retaining the benefit of it ourselves. We must let it shine, or it will go out; and if the light that is in us become darkness, how great is that darkness? We hope all who have been enlightened will take warning in time, and not let their light become extinct.

The first thing to which we call your attention, in the way of public action, is the support and circulation of this paper. The present volume is near its close. If it has not given you satisfaction in all things, and you have differed from some things presented in its columns, you are at least no worse off than your Editor himself. He, certainly, would not like to be responsible for all the sentiments of correspondents, nor wish to feel himself obliged to state always wherein he differs from them. No article is ever rejected because it differs from the views of the Editor: no article is ever altered or shortened for that reason. It is intended to give all contributors a fair hearing; yet, there are sometime communications so written that it would be no credit to the writer himself to insert them without alterations and amendments. Such alterations we do not feel called upon to undertake, except in rare cases, and where we know it would be agreeable to the writer.

Whatever may be said in relation to these or other matters, we are satisfied there is no paper more impartial towards correspondents than the Herald of Life. That some should be disaffected is unavoidable with all periodicals. We, probably, have as few such as any other. We thank our friends for the interest hitherto manifested in the Herald; and trust there will be no lack of it for time to come.

As this volume will soon be completed, we invite all who intend to continue their subscriptions to renew as soon as possible; otherwise there may be confusion and delay in their receiving the first numbers of Vol. III.; as it is the practice of this Office to discontinue the paper when the subscription price has expired. In this way we have no occasion to send duns to any one; and we do not have to inform the public how much is due us, that we ought to have. At the beginning of a new volume our mail books will be arranged to show who has paid in advance for the volume; and to such only will the paper be sent, except it is by special agreement with the subscriber. All will see, therefore, the earlier they pay for the next volume, before this closes, the more certain they are to have their paper reach them without interruption, and without loss of any of the first numbers. Let as many as can, pay at our annual meeting; but none need fear to send the amount by mail, if properly inclosed, and directed to "Geo Storrs, Box 4658, New York." Very few letters, thus directed, have failed to reach us for several years; and the risk is very small when even a letter unsealed has come to hand cantaining money! Let none hazard such an experiment, however.

Next, after the paper, is the Missionary and Tract cause. These are intimately connected. A Missionary should have a good supply of tracts or papers to give away, that the people may have something to keep up attention after he has moved on to other places. It is desirable to have a permanent Missionary establishment in the West, not far from St. Louis; that from thence may sound out the truth in all directions, and that papers and tracts can be scattered not only in Ills., but in Missouri, Kansas, Arkansas, Kentucky and other places South.

Shall we not take hold of this work in earnest? Br. W. S. Campbell is already in the Western field, and we believe doing a good work. Shall we not put forth our hands to sustain him there? We think it should be done: we trust it will be, and that God's blessing will be on the work.

These are some of the objects which demand the attention of the friends of "Life only in Christ." A great and an effectual door seems to be opening before us; and we want funds and men to occupy the fields white already to harvest. As to men, we wish for none who are fearful and ready to faint; but men who are ready to labor for Christ and his truth in a self-sacrificing spirit: men, who do not go out for ease or pastime, but to work in the Lord's vineyard, content to look to the life future for their reward. Yet these men must have food and raiment, and their families must be looked after, if they have any; hence funds must be raised to carry on the work; and the time has come to see what can be done. Some can give one dollar, some ten, some $50, some $100, some $500, others, perhaps, $1000; but we wish not to set limits: let all do as the Lord has prospered them, and we shall soon find the means as plentiful as the manna for the children of Israel.

The work is the Lord's: let us take hold of it as such; and, if need be, the Lord can make the means as plentiful as bread in Samaria after it had been besieged by Ben-hadad till famine seemed ready to destroy them, and the prophet Elisha was sent with a message that the next day flour should be sold extremely cheap in the gate of the city, which came to pass; though "a lord, on whose hand the king leaned, answered the man of God, and said, 'Behold if the Lord would make windows in heaven, this might be.'" The thing was; but this unbelieving "lord" was "trodden to death in the gate" by the crowds who came for the bread. See 2 Kings vii. Away with unbelief when we are in the Lord's work. He that soweth sparingly will reap sparingly; but he that soweth bountifully shall also reap bountifully. See 2 Corth. ix. 6. Those who are willing to take God for Paymaster may have an opportunity now to try him. We have no fear but what they will find the investment good. We have proved it more than once and know it is safe. May we all "come up to the help of the Lord, to the help of the Lord against the mighty." See Judges v. 23. The Lord wants our help and He must have it, if we would share in the blessing.

Star Gazers.

"A Horrible Prediction.—Professor Leonidas, an Indianapolis astrologer, after looking at the rings around the sun, makes the following horrible prophecy:—'I observe by the planets that a dreadful plague will commence in Russia, originating from silks brought over from Egypt, Cairo, and Turkey. It will extend across the Baltic Sea, desolate Germany, cause immense mortality in England, and then spread to the United States. This dreadful epidemic will spot the people like a leopard, and turn the flesh of a purple black. The pestilence will carry off such an amount of mortals that there will not be enough left to bury the dead or give them Christian burial. The streets of our cities, towns, and villages will be swarmed with the dead and dying. The groans and yells of horror will fill every breast with consternation. Confusion will abound on all sides. The death-knell will cease to toll as the malady rages in fury. The infected will fall and die wherever they take it. The stench of the dead will become so common that the survivors will not heed it.'"
—A City Paper.

Such prognostications some people will believe, though no amount of evidence could convince them that the "plague" of an endless death is just before them, and that there is only one way of escape from it, and that is by applying to the Great Physician and Life-giver, Jesus Christ, who alone is "the resurrection and the life." In him, and abiding there, we need fear no plague earth may be visited with, even if as "horrible" as the one "Prof. Leonidas" prognosticates as coming. "A thousand shall fall at thy side, and ten thousand at thy right hand; but it shall not come nigh thee: only with thine eyes shalt thou behold and see the reward of the wicked. Because thou hast made the Lord my refuge, the Most High, thy habitation: there shall no evil befal thee, neither shall any plague come nigh thy dwelling; for He shall give his angels charge over thee, to keep thee in all thy ways," &c. How safe are all they that put their trust in the Lord our God, "whatever ills the world befall." Let every child of God rest unwaveringly in this strong tower; nor let any prognostications of "astrologers," or star-gazers interrupt their child-like reliance on God our heavenly Father.

An Approaching Storm.—The following, from a Paris correspondent, dated November 18, 1864, published in the New York Tribune, shows how theological matters appear in Europe:

"There are those who think that what is passing in the whole religious world to-day is but the harbinger of a great approaching change; of the dissolution of that system of medieval theocracy, which has exercised for a thousand years so great a power over the minds and consciences of men and the most of nations. Many of the most enlightened minds of this age are filled with a presentiment of an approaching storm; and though we are unable to foresee the results of a great ecclesiastical revolution (of which the fall of the temporal power of the Papacy would probably be the signal), yet it is impossible for the most sanguine, or the most indifferent, to ignore that in every European country a stong religious movement is taking place."

A Pleasant-day Reflection.

BY W. S. CAMPBELL.

Instances have often occurred in which men have labored long to build up and establish a good cause, who have never seen the great fruit of their self sacrificing efforts. The call was to work in the vineyard; to sow the seed in the morning, and in the evening withhold not thine hand, for what did they know of the prosperity of this or that department of truth?

It is a very trying, and sometimes almost crushing to occupy the place that is given to the minister, or to a class of christians, to observe the small degree of honest gratitude around them—but it is not to them, they should recollect, or for them that the sheaves are to be brought. They are to work for the Master; occupying till his return who has left them in charge. Generations unborn may reap the benefits of the important truths which they have promulgated. Thousands may be brought to Christ who will be reached by the principles they planted, with labors which required the sacrifice of all they possessed—and have been watered by their tears and prayers, with watching and weariness and painfulness; and, by day and night, devoting all their energies to one great purpose. Nations may be affected by the truths inculcated, at first, by an obscure monk, as in the case of the Reformation.

If so great effects upon the masses of men are seen in the present world, many may come to praise Christ in the kingdom; and the result is not to be looked for this side of the great gathering in the kingdom of God, when will appear all the jewels of the Lord, who has thrust us out into his harvest, knowing well, what difficulties we should find, how we should be tried and hindered, and, especially, all the qualifications our labor would receive. That which plagues us most did not escape his notice, and while the desire is great to effect the largest consequence, of all this sacrifice, we know that by activity we shall glorify his name; even by lesser results. And, at the same time, we shall be tried, and by trial be refined; fitted for still farther work, and for the Master's joy, when he shall return.

So far from our complaining that others have entered into our labors; which we might do as well as any class we know of, and with a much better grace, often; we will have to submit to the accusations that we have entered into theirs; because we have only kept on searching in the field, and found jewels they do not know how to prize. This becomes one of the most afflicting applications, of the trial of the work, that can be given to the minister or the faithful and devoted member. And to succeed in the control of the body, this has been abundantly resorted to. Men, who have planted and watered, and to whom the self constituted inquisitors, were once indebted, under God, for their escape from the darkness and errors of their past relations, are counted intruders, in their own labors; and if a sufficient number can be found to indorse the dissimulation—a new purpose is at once announced—we must leave the field, or allow these theological guerillas to lead in their raids upon whatever plunder they may choose to appropriate, or interest they may attempt to establish. And when the move is made there may be found plenty to promote it, for the movers will professedly adhere to those who first entered the field till they have found they have a majority, then, it is not doctrine they want, it is their cause, they assever; and hence, what they call heresy shall not be presented.

Now it may be that these men, some of whom manifestly never had a call to the work, either from lack of ability, want of adaptation in talent, or an entire absence of the sense of responsibility which should constantly attend the mind—never had a call to the ministry, by the great Head of the Church, and can deny that there is any special call. It may be that they judge others by themselves. Having jumped aboard, they have had some special theme to harp upon; have seen a few converted or "come forward for prayers;" have been made something of, and had a good time: and will jump off as soon as they think they can do better—would even run the whole train down a precipice if it would serve their purpose. They would not feel the good of the cause sufficiently to give them any grief. They have not devoted a life-time to it. The Holy Ghost never made them overseers. 'Tis not so with others. They are in trouble to see wasting and destruction in the fields of truth. They still can leave the event with God, and die, if they must, at work in the same determined and self-denying manner—consecrating all their powers to His own, dear, precious truth.

We will, then, faithfully preach Christ; and, whether counted orthodox or heterodox, declare the whole counsel of God. The time of reward will come by-and-by; and then the Great Shepherd will discern who has been faithful—who has labored fully in the building of the temple of truth.

Beloved brethren will sometimes have occasion to mourn that they see so little lasting good. Some, especially, who are ready ever to place in the fore-front their "voluntary humility, not in any honor to the satisfying of the flesh" will not be backward to notice this, while a continual effort must be made to repair the damages they produce, and the first could say over these very persons, "We have labored in vain and spent our strength for naught," but there is a vast amount done in the end, and God will rightly place the crown. There will be no room left for rejoicing over individual successes when the full glory of our Redeemer shall fill his most glorious kingdom. All praise to him for the gospel. Thank God for the power which attends it. It is the truth, mighty to save. Christ is our righteousness. Hallelujah!

Western Mission—No. 12.

FROM W. S. CAMPBELL.

Springfield, Ill., Aug. 4, 1865.

With many regrets we left Otto, and old Fulton Co.; for with all the hardships we had endured, we became attached to the lovers of our Lord, and the blessed life doctrines which we preach. We shall often think with pleasure of the kind associations of labor with the dear friends who, some of them at least, seem almost alone. We believe that there will be much fruit in the end result from this effort, notwithstanding the great disadvantages under which we labored.

We feel under obligation to friends which we have not yet mentioned personally. At Br. Moses Freeman's, P. M., at Otto, we always received Christian hospitality, and found a pleasant and welcome home, when we came from the toil of an appointment. Be sure, it was prized. We are thankful. May the Lord reward them. Sister Freeman and her brother, Uncle Nathan Teft, were from Rhode Island, formerly. We could visit upon the little things, of days bygone, and the great ones of the present and future.

Br. J. Benson received us gladly, and helped us after a godly sort. Br. Brown gave us essential aid.

The brother, dear man, who thought, I suppose, there might be some credit in severely criticising my second communication, is kindly asked to show the "libel"; for, "pastoral labor" I certainly had done, and had been in the State, if not at Otto, over Sunday; and secondly, I did not say that I, or "we," were at the first meeting, at Brown's grove; but the meeting was a good one. Better in his view, possibly, had it presented more of the namby-pamby character. We go for identifying things, when we can; others do too, often.

I take great pleasure in saying to my Eastern friends that I had good opportunity of visiting the tomb of Lincoln, at "Oak Ridge Cemetery," on Thursday, Aug. 3. The tomb in which the martyred President now lies, is the recieving tomb of the Cemetery. It is kept open during the day, that visitors, who are many, may look in, guarded by soldiers, night and day. A ridge covered with moderate sized oak trees, up back of this tomb, has been selected as the final resting place of the great and good man who fell a sacrifice to the cause of liberty. There a monument, in grandeur, exceeding any one reared to commemorate one man, in this country, will be constructed. It appears to me very strange, indeed, that the lot, (a beautiful grove, near the city) offered for the sepulture of this great man was not accepted. Whether I shall be accused of having made my pilgrimage to the American Mecca, I cannot yet determine. Those who know me, know I would go there, if I had the privilege. And how fortunate. Springfield lay in our way. We needed the rest. We wished to visit the few there who look for the Coming King; and I could easily look at the place of the last repose, adopted for the Ruler of a mighty people.

"Who touched the highest point of all his greatnes; and from the meridian of his glory, hasted to the setting." The sun went down in a blaze of light—but the nation lives; men, for all time, will mourn the man; and his enemies, even, come to admire his administration. He lived and governed, when the throes of national labor brought forth a new being in the development of liberty.

The multitudinous rush of thought prevented me from saying anything upon the vast subject, before my apprehension, as I had intended. It might not be adapted to the character of this article, and by some would be judged inappropriate to your columns to enlarge upon this pregnant question. I will, therefore, reserve what I will say, if I can speak upon a subject so mighty, to a future time.

I will add, that we are at work in this place, (Hornsby) and having a good hearing. There is a great interest to hear on the life doctrines, and we feel well strengthend to "contend for the faith delivered to the saints." A very intelligent class come to listen to the word of life. There is prejudice, but it does not hedge up our way. We shall hold meetings here for a week, perhaps, and are not yet determined where to pitch our tent next.

I yesterday heard a discourse intended to prove the dual entity of man. Is that all a Western champion, of the natural immortality of the soul, can say? I may review him in the Herald.

The Spirit of the Advent.

"Not every one that saith, Lord, Lord! shall enter into the kingdom of heaven." "Many shall say unto me in that day, Lord, Lord, have we not prophesied in thy name? ....and then will I profess unto them, I never knew you." These expressions of the Master appear to refer to hypocrites—those who make pretentions of devotion to Christ, but who care not for his will. Perhaps it will not be deemed unjust if we remark that the last quoted passage applies very directly to Advent hypocrites, who "prophesy" in the Lord's name indeed, but are none the less

"false prophets." But we propose to address yet another class of Adventists, those who cannot be called hypocrites, but who may truthfully be called "foolish virgins." Hypocritical Adventists will have no quarter from the Judge. To them he will say, "I never knew you: depart from me, ye that work iniquity." But to the "foolish virgins," he will speak in milder tones, and yet in reproof—"Verily I say unto you, I know you not." Woe unto the first class! for they shall be cut off from among the people. Sorrow unto the second class, for they shall be shut out from the marriage festival.

"But why do you address Adventists? Why don't you curse the Churches, and let us alone." Because we prefer not to waste our ammunition. On all proper occasions we shall try to be faithful to our kinsmen of the Church general; but we have also a duty to perform toward Adventists. For the hypocrites, rebuke! for the foolish ones, the warning note!

Ten virgins go forth to meet the Bridegroom, ten Advent virgins. There are no nypocrites among the ten, but there are five foolish ones. The whole ten have lamps, they all believe in the coming of the Bride-groom. They preach it, they pray it, they sing it. The whole ten have oil in their lamps—they have a measure of the spirit of the Advent, But there is a marked difference between the two classes just here. The wise have a sufficient supply of oil for every contingency; they have oil in their vessels as well as in their lamps: but the foolish have no other oil than that in their lamps. What oil they have, they did not buy themselves, they got it from the wise. While they have dealings with the wise, they have something to burn, they have enough of the spirit of the Advent to create an idea that they will get into the marriage—they expect the kingdom. But the time cometh when the wise will refuse any more oil; they will become more and more estranged from the foolish virgins until they will at length peremptorily answer to the solicitations of the foolish—"Lest there be not enough for us and you, go ye rather to them that sell, and buy for yourselves." The result will be that the foolish will be shut out of the kingdom; yet they shall be saved as by fire.

Foolish ones, take warning! Ye that live on time excitement, take warning! Ye that receive honor one of another, take warning! Ye that wink at wrong-doing, take warning! Ye that are destitute of the power of God in your own souls, take warning! The Spirit of God must reign in your hearts, if you would reign with Christ. "The kingdom of God is not in word, but in power!" Not in Advent talk, but in Advent power! Deceive not yourselves! the spirit of the Advent is not a temporizing spirit, an indifferent spirit, a self-sufficient spirit, a clownish spirit, a selfish spirit, a worldly spirit, a stubborn spirit, an unjust spirit. Neither think that you are called to take for your masters fearfulness and expediency. To all who obtain the kingdom, God gives the spirit of the Advent, which is not "the spirit of fear; but of power, and of love, and of a sound mind." "He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches."

The preparation for the kingdom is the Spirit of God enthroned in the soul—nothing less than this will stand the test. And be sure that it is the Spirit from God. Let the wise continue to be wise! let the foolish hasten to to become wise! Be wise in time. The kingdom is "the prize of our high calling."

J. T. C.

A Subscriber Lost.

EROM G. W. DENNY.

NEW HAVEN, CONN., Aug, 7, 1865.

I see by a letter in the Crisis, from H. M. Bryant, that you have lost or will lose one of your subscribers on account of his having changed his views on the doctrine of life out of Christ. The reason he gives is mainly, he says, because the Spirit and what he understood to be the word does not agree. Secondly: he has never known a sinner converted, or a backslider reclaimed, and none made better by believing it.

By your permission, Br. Storrs, I wish to make a few remarks on the above.

The lost subscriber, I judge by the article, pretends to preach sometimes. I never saw him; never heard his name mentioned; know nothing about him except as I form an opinion from his article; let those who know him judge by the following how near right I am.

I take him to be a man who is led by others, and is no leader of the people, is easily influenced this way, then that; not very much of a doctrinal man, holds no doctrine very tenacious: is generally led by what he terms the Spirit; and what he terms the Spirit he prefers before the word, or rather interprets the word by it; he prorbably follows his feelings to determine what his duty is, and his enjoyment of religion consists in feeling well in meeting, with kindred spirits about him.

On the whole, I take him to be a christian, but not very strong, not an example to the flock. We have scores of such among the advent people; they generally, as they say, (when in meeting), "go in for the life and power of religion;" but out of meeting their life is inconsistent in some respects, and they lose their influence.

First: He nor any of us have a right to try any doctrine of the bible by what we may term the spirit: but on the contrary, we are to try the spirits by the word.

2. He says, he has never known a sinner converted by it. Did he ever know of a sinner's being converted at all? if so, what converted him? I suppose one half, if not three fourths, of the advent people were converted and professing christians before they came out from the different Churches. What converted them? Was it the doctrine of the sleep of the dead, the resurrection of the wicked and killing them again; the soon coming of the Lord, water baptism? &c. Was it any of these doctrines? No; for they never heard of them till after conversion; and so the churches can get up a hue-and-cry and say to us, "Your doctrines do not convert; you were converted among us." The question comes up, seriously, what did convert us while among the churches? Was it the doctrine of the immortality of the souls? No. Was it sprinkling? No. Eternal torments? No. Going to heaven at death? No. The Trinity doctrine? No, no; none of these. What then did do the work for us, if it was none of their doctrines nor none of ours that converted us? What was it? I answer it was the glorious doctrine of our Lord, namely, "Repent and believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved." Did we believe? We did. Did we repent? We did. Were we converted? We were.

Dear readers, converted or unconverted, here is only two conditions, and the only ones mentioned in his word as being necessary in order to get converted to our dear Lord; they are, repent and believe. But some will ask, Believe what? I answer: believe that Christ is the Son of the living God; that is all that is required of us to believe in order to get into Christ, and be a christian of the genuine kind. It may, and I think does, need more than this to turn some men to Christ. But some may say, What advantage then hath the learned believing Christian over the ignorant and weak saint?

I answer: Much every way. It is not salvation to be converted; it is only the beginning of a work which must be carried on to the end; and Paul says, "Therefore leaving the first principles of the doctrine of Christ let us go on unto perfection." And these truths, which we hold dear, are the means by which we grow up into Christ our perfect head; they are like the sap to the sion after it is grafted into the vine; and it will take all the truth we have to save some, even after they are in Christ by conversion.

I believe that thousands of converted sinners in the nominal churches are falling away yearly because they have not got the truth we hold. They have nothing but the first principles; consequently they do not grow; but after awhile many of them backslide. If they had the doctrine of No life out of Christ, they would live, thrive and become strong; whereas, they wither, droop, and die; Bryant's opinion to the contrary notwithstanding.

But Bryant says that he knows of none who are made better by believing it. Who made him a judge over God's heritage, to determine the effect of truth on the hearts of his children? I know of scores who say that this very truth has been the means of a renewal of their faith and of quickening them in their love towards God. The understanding of this truth, I verily, believe, will be the means of carrying thousands through, that would otherwise have fallen out by the way. Of what advantage is it to plant seed, and then, when it has taken root and sprouted, to let the weeds choke out the crop? It is labor lost, and worse than thrown away. Look at the revivals and conversions in the land; what do they amount to as a whole? A few stand; but the great bulk roll back like the sow that was washed to her wallowing in the mire; and all this for the want of an understanding of God's plan of saving men through Christ, which Bryant ignores.

Then we are much more likely to get converted than they are to stay converted. It is easier to plant the seed than it is to take care of the crop. Some men are always planting, but never hoe the corn: they get little that is worth harvesting. So with some religious planters. They say, "plant, plant"—Well, that is right. But never do they cultivate the crop, and even oppose God's revealed plan of a dealing with men. They try to hinder God from showing men the way of salvation through Christ. True, Christ said to the world, repent and be converted. But to his ministers he said, three times, as fast as he could speak, "Feed my sheep; feed my lambs." And so we will. Let us plant and prune to the end.

> Life with its toils will soon be oe'r;
> Then we can plant and prune no more;
> And how can we endure the thought
> Of having starved the Lamb's he bought.

BR. STORRS I do not now expect to be at the annual meeting at Springfield. I should love dearly to be there; but do not see as I can be. But you may count on me for twenty five dollars to help support the Herald of Life the coming Year. The paper must be supported: the flock must be fed: and if Bryant disapproves and forsakes, no matter.

> We want no cowards in our band
> That will their colors fly:
> God calls for valient hearted men
> That are not afraid to die.

Br. Storrs, feed the flock of God which he hath purchased with the blood of his Son. For behold the Lord cometh quickly, and his reward is with him to give every man according as his work shall be.

NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—H. M. Bryant says, in the Crisis, "I had the Crisis stopped nearly a year ago because I didn't feel able to take and pay for two papers. I preferred the Herald of Life," &c. It seems then he took the Herald from choice, and we sent it to him from No. 1 to No. 25, of the present volume; then we discontinued it because he had not paid anything for it, and we heard nothing from him. A poor excuse for "stopping the Crisis" he seems to have given, for he took the Herald six months without offering to pay for it. Of course, we did not know that he was a "preacher." We are quite willing to send it to preachers gratis; but we expect them to show their goodwill by endeavoring to increase its circulation. To all such it is a pleasure to send it, whether they pay the subscription price or not.

God not the God of all People.

"And I will take you to me for a people, and I will be to you a God." Ex. vi. 7. "And I will give them an heart to know me, that I am the Lord; and they shall be my people, and I will be their God: for they shall return unto me with their whole heart." Jer. xxiv. 7. "Neither shall they defile themselves any more with their idols, nor with their detestable things, nor with any of their transgressions; but I will save them out of all their their dwelling places wherein they have sinned, and will cleanse them: so shall they be my people, and I will be their God." Ezek. xxxvii. 23. "But this shall be the covenant that I will make with the house of Israel; after those days, saith the Lord, I will put my law in their inward parts, and write it in their hearts; and will be their God, and they shall be my people." Jer. xxxi. 33. "For thou hast confirmed to thyself thy people Israel, to be a people unto thee forever: and thou Lord, art become their God." 2 Sam. vii. 24. "Yet the number of the children of Israel shall be as the sand of the sea, which cannot be measured or numbered; and it shall come to pass, that in the place where it was said unto them, ye are not my people, there it shall be said unto them, Ye are sons of the living God." Hosea i. 10, "But now they desire a better country, that is an heavenly: wherefore God is not ashamed to be called their God." Heb. xi. 16.

We here have a large amount of positive proof to sustain our position Let the contexts of these passages be carefully studied, and the candid mind will be fully convinced that God is the God of none except the "pure in heart;" those who have the law of God written in their hearts. Such are heirs of the promise through faith, hence children of Abraham, of whom God is the God.

From the above it is very plain that God is not the God of the wicked. But God is the God of all that have a resurrection. The reflecting mind, who believes that "the dead know not anything," must at once see that it is necessarily so; for if they have no God, by what power can they be raised? Jesus however proves the proposition in Luke xx. 37, 38.

Our conclusion is, The wicked cannot have a resurrection. "And I heard a great voice out of heaven, saying, Behold, the tabernacle of God is with men, and he will dwell with them, and they shall be his people, and God himself will be with them, and be their God." Rev. xxi. 3. May we so live, that God will not be ashamed to own us as children, and crown us with immortality.

D. EDSON SMITH.

Vesper, N. Y., Aug. 2. 1865.

Response for Western Mission.

EATONTOWN, N. J., Aug 9, 1865.

BR. STORRS.—In reading the Herald of Life, last week, I observed an earnest appeal "to all the lovers of the life theme" in behalf of the Western Mission. I consider myself a lover of life only through Christ, and therfore wish to do what little I can in sustaining it; and from all accounts there is a large field for labor in the West; the harvest truly is plenty but the laborers are few; and if by any means the few that are there can stay, they should; which they would willingly do if their families could be provided for; and now we should remember the exhortation of John, "But whoso hath this world's goods, and seeth his brother have need, and shutteth up his bowels of compassion from him, how dwelleth the love of God in him?" If each one who loves this precious theme would give as the Lord has prospered them, how many who are now hungering and thirsting after righteousness might be filled. But there is such a disposition in these last days to get all you can and keep all you get, that there is little to give for the spreading of the truth.

I herein send one dollar for the support of the Western Mission, leaving it with you to appropriate it as you see fit. For my part, I think we are living very near the coming of the Lord, and the gospel Trumpet should be sounded loud and clear that all may hear of the coming of the great king, and that by him, they may have an entrance in through the gates into the city; otherwise, when the king rises up and shutteth up the door it will be everlastingly too late. Probation has had its day and a long one too, but it is soon to close, never to dawn again. Oh that we may all be ready when the last awful trump shall sound which will forever fix our destiny. Yours in hope of Life.

Letters and Extracts.

From Eld. J. Lewis.

BR. STORRS.—I send you $2 for Dr. P. J. Wardner, Springfield, Ill., $2 for S. D. Emmons; and one dollar from a new subscriber, Andrew J. Duncan, Hornsby, Ills. Keep good courage, Br. George, we will send you more soon. The paper must be sustained. God's cause demands it; and let every one feel his own responsibility; and so let him act. The cause is gaining ground out here; and if Br. Campbell can be sustained in the West, much good will result from his labors. The people are waking up: the Priests are being troubled; they dont know what to do. One said, he wished he was a good way off from here. May God speed the truth and spread it far and near. I expect to live to see the blasphemous notion of God's bringing the wicked dead to life for the purpose of inflicting pain and to make them die again, given up by every honest, sincere inquirer after truth. But some will not believe any way; they will not confess. O, I feel deeply for such. May God help them to break through before it is too late.

FRANKLIN B. DODGE, Bradley, Me., sends a new subscriber, and writes:—The truth is gaining here, and I hope the good Lord will bless and prosper you in his glorious cause. I hope to be able to send more subscribers. Yours in hope of future life through Christ.

A FRIEND in Scotland, writes:—Dear Christian Brother, through the kindness of my much esteemed friend Mr. James L. Boyd, Philadelphia, I have received the HERALD OF LIFE since its first publication. It is refreshing to me, who stand alone in the Faith in this place, to have such a friend as the Herald of Life to commune with weekly. I am but poor as far as this world's wealth is concerned, but I hope my mite will be accepted (small though it be) [£1 sterling, or, $6,84.—ED.] as the offering of a willing heart for the good cause the Herald advocates. Yours in hope of eternal life throuuh Jesus Christ our Saviour.

WM. H. H. MCALLISTER, St. Albans, Vt., writes:—My health is much improved, and I am once more in business: have a position in the Custom House in this place. God has been very merciful to me, and I praise him for affliction and trial; and most of all, that he has sanctified them to my best good. I can write you but a line now. I will let you hear from me at our annual meeting at Springfield, and if possible will be there myself.

NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—Br. McAllister went into the army at an early day, a stranger to our views and experimental religion. He was sick in a Hospital in Philadelphia when we first saw him. Through the labors of Jacob Grim he was brought to the knowledge of the life truth. Afterwards he returned to the army in Virginia—was wounded, and went to the Hospital in Burlington, Vt., his native State, from thence to Stowe, where he was in a critical condition for a long time. He is now, we are rejoiced to hear, improved in health, rejoicing in the Lord, and in business. We hope, if possible, he may be with us at Springfield next week, and that he may meet Br. Grim there also.

MELISSA A. SAWYER, Troy, Me., writes:—I am very glad to have the privilege, through the goodness of God, of sending another dollar for the Herald. I expected to have sent it sooner, but my health has been so poor I could not. Since last spring I have been under the care of Dr. Billings of Corinna, and he has, under God, in a great measure restored me to health, so that I hope soon to be able to work. I thought while reading the Herald of Life this morning, how glad I would be to help Sister Henry get her health; also, to help Br. Campbell, but I cannot. One thing is certain, I believe the Lord will be with them, and help to pull down the strongholds of satan. I am glad we have got such a merciful God as to destroy the wicked, and ot make or keep them alive to torment. O, I am glad I ever saw the light on the non-reliving of the wicked dead. I wish I could have the privilege of going to meeting. Almost all the preaching we have is from the Herald of Life. We hail its weekly visits with pleasure. I am glad to see Br. Burbank coming out on the side of truth. May we all have life in the Kingdom. The Lord being my helper, I will try.

GEO. FLINT, Central Falls, R. I., writes:—I have taken great pleasure in reading your valuable paper, the HERALD OF LIFE. The views you advocate, I call Bible truth. I want the paper more than ever. I expected my subscription would run out before I could send another dollar, because my means are very limited. For four months I have been afflicted with inflammatory rheumatism, and could not earn any thing. I now begin to earn a little, and send you $1 for the Herald. I am nearly 73 years old, and cannot expect to labor with my hands but little longer. I believe I scatter some of the Gospel seed, of the kingdom under the whole heavens, as I go, by the way side: the truth which is every where spoken against. My prayer is, that the birds may not pick it all away; but I leave the event with the Lord. The less I work the more I read. I want you to send me the back numbers, as I want to read the discussion with the Methodist champion. [Dr. Louden, we suppose he means.—ED.]

ELD. WILLIAM BRAYTON, New Hartford, Iowa, writes:—I send a new subscriber, with $2 inclosed. He lives in the midst of a large body of Adventists, and will not fail to use your paper to the best advantage. He is half a believer in the doctrine of "No life out of Christ." I think he will soon be an esablished one.

Tent Meeting in Maine.

There will be a Tent-meetingin Exeter, Me, near the old Chamberlin Meeting-house, commencing Saturday, Sept. 2, 1865, and hold the ensuing week and the following Sabbath. We hope Brethren will make some effort to attend this meeting. There will be a Boarding Tent on the ground, and provision made for horses near by. All coming from the west, by cars, will stop at Newport and take the stage for Corinna, where they will find conveyance to the ground Saturday and Monday. Come brethren; come at the commencement of the meeting and bring your tents, all who can; and those who cannot, can find lodging near by; so there will be no need of any staying away.

Our Annual Meeting.

The annual meeting of the "LIFE AND ADVENT UNION" will be held in Rice's Hall, Springfield, Mass., August 25, 1865, at 2 P. M. We trust that all who can, will come and show by their presence their interest in the cause of truth. Never was there a greater need for honest, earnest, persevering effort than at the present moment. The Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ is now, as it ever has been, the great panacea for earthly ills, the great antidote to the poison of Satanic error, the great key to the purposes of God, the great expositor of man's destiny, the great light that pierces the darkness of the valley of the shadow of death and enables us to see our path to a future and eternal life. Can we be too earnest in carrying these glad tidings to our fellow men? Can we be too anxious that the thousands of our fellow Christians who are led astray by the serpent lie should learn "a more excellent way"? Can we be too uncompromising in our active opposition to that last trick of the devil, which falsely names itself Spiritualism? Let our answer be emphatic. Let all who can, come to our annual meeting, prepared to show their estimation of their responsibility by united action for the systematic spread of the truth.

We have a suggestion to make to those who will not find it practicable to attend the meeting. Let all such who feel disposed write their sentiments, at length or in brief, as the case may be, and send their communications to be read before the meeting. Direct to Joseph T. Curry, Box 393, Springfield, Mass. There is no reason that we should not have a gathering in spirit of every friend of the Life theme. Let us have a load of letters.

And now we commend this and all other schemes for the spread of the Gospel to the prayers of the saints every where. "The fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much."

The Western Mission.

The time for which Br. CAMPBELL went West to labor has fully expired, yet he is still in the work there. Shall this Mission be sustained and continued? We are satisfied it should be, and hope all the friends will be of the same mind. In order for it to be continued, we need more funds. The least we can do is to support Br. Campbell's family, if he is is to remain absent from them. But besides this, he must have papers and tracts to distribute, and he will have other unavoidable expenses in getting over the country. We earnestly appeal, therefore, to all the lovers of the life theme to come forward with their free-will offerings for this special object. We are quite sure the appeal will not be in vain. Let us hear from the willing hearted at once; as it is important to know soon what we can do further for this mission.

STORRS; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This word contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in plain binding, 50 cents; in paper covers. 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near ten years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER: OR, MAN IN DEATH; AND THE HOPE FOR A FUTURE LIFE.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead, can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none there fore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD; OR, THE RIGHTEOUS ONLY WILL LIVE AGAIN. By GEO. STORRS. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the EDITOR of the HERALD OF LIFE. Price, $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.—IMMORTALITY: The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev, T. M. POST, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by GEO. STORRS. Price in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. POST, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a Prize Essay on IMMORTALITY, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men, with ut egard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. POST took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The REVIEWER followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The Author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

BIBLE VS. TRADITION: in which the True Teaching of the Bible is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity Life, Death, &c. Price, bound, $1. Postage 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. It is a work of much labor and research. The title indicates its object, and the performance shows the object was kept in view throughout. The language is sometimes severe on what is called "orthodoxy—more so than is desirable—but the value of the work, in general, cannot be over-estimated. Thousands of it have been sent abroad, and thousand more ought to be scattered. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subjects; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

LINES.

BY MARIA MATTHEWS WEAVER.

From earth's storms O let me hide
By my dear Redeemer's side,
Let me find a refuge there,
Let me in his glory share.

Let me lean on his strong arm
When I see approaching harm,
When I faint in life's rough way,
May he be my staff and stay.

When life's cares oppress my soul—
O'er my feet dark waters roll,
When the world grows dark as night,
May He shed his holy light.

Saviour bless me, even me,
Let me thy salvation see;
Lead me gently by thy hand
To the bright and better land.

BEYOND THE GARDEN-GATE.

"Children," said Mrs. Jay, "you may play anywhere in the yard, but don't go beyond the garden-gate. Do you hear me, Peter ?" "Yes, mother," said Peter, looking up from his wheel-barrow: "Do not go beyond the garden-gate!" Mother then, seeing her little boy and girl quietly at play in the yard, put on her bonnet and shawl, and went down the street.

Peter and Jessie, his little sister, had nice plays together. He used to make believe horse, and draw her on his trucks, or she make believe a pumpkin, and be carred in his wheel-barrow; or they would both make believe cows and set up a terrible mooing ; indeed, there was no end to the different characters they took, all the while keeping very kind to each other. Their plays this afternoon led them down to the bottom of the garden, where there was a gate, hasped inside, which opened into a field of thick underbrush and trees, sloping down to a lower part of the village. This was the forbidden gate.

"I wish we could go out into the wood's," said Peter; "perhaps we should find a bird's nest." Peter unhasped the gate, and he and Jessie looked around and saw the pretty woods. "But what did mother tell us ?" asked Jessie. "Perhaps she was afraid of bears," answered Peter, "or the water in these woods, or something; but there are no bears. Oh ! there's a squirrel on that tree ! See him, see him, Jessie;" and away ran Peter to the woods, and away ran Jessie after him. The squirrel hid, and the children went on, hoping to find another. They strayed down a bank, and came to a brook and little pond. "Mother thought we'd fall into this pond, and that's the reason she cautioned us against coming here," said Peter; "but we shan't, shall we, Jessie ?" "No," answered Jessie, "we won't." And so they ran round, and tumbled about, and picked flowers, and at last got back to the garden-gate safe and unharmed, without anybody knowing they went. "Jessie," said P ter, "don't you tell." Not if mother asks?" asked Jessie. "She won't ask," said Peter.

Mother did not ask, nor did Jessie tell, and all went on at home as usual. Saturday night, after the children were washed, and Jessie had gone to sleep, Peter and his mother talked a little longer together, as they often did on Saturday night. Peter said: "Mother I have been in the woods beyond the garden-gate this week." "When did you go ?" she asked. He told her. "And mother," he said, "nothing happened to us there ; we didn't fall into the water, or get wet, or tear our clothes; no bears ate us up. Why didn't you want us to go ?"

"You lost something that afternoon in the woods," said his mother. "Lost something!" said Peter ; and he thought of his knife, and his slate pencils, and his ball, and a three-cent piece in his pocket ; he hadn't lost one of them, he was quite sure. "Yes," repeated his mother, "think a moment what you have missed, for I know you have lost something." Peter for a moment thought his mother must be a spirit ; for how could she know when he didn't know himself ? "You will recollect if you think," said she. Peter put his head under the bed-quilt, for he began to see he had lost something ; and the more he thought, the more sure he was of it. "Mother," he at last said in a little sorrowful voice, "I did lose something in those woods, I did ; I lost the happy out of my heart." Ah, that was it ; and a sad loss it is when a child loses the happy out of his heart.

It does not always concern a child to know why his parents forbid him this or that ; his duty is obedience. Nor because nothing befalls him in a course of disobedience, must he conclude no harm is done at all. Peter and Jessie got home safely ; but was there no harm done ? Yes, yes ; the happy left their hearts. They were afraid—afraid their mother would find it out. This is the way doing wrong wrongs you. It wrongs you out of that peace and comfort which God made you to enjoy ; and all Peter's play in the woods did not make up for this loss until he told his mother and received her forgiveness with her good-night kiss.

THE PERSEVERING ROBIN.

As I looked out of my chamber window quite early—earlier than perhaps some of you looked out of yours—I saw under a large rose-bush a beautiful robin, whose wings, all sparkling with dew-drops, looked as fresh as the bright spring green.

The movements of the robin were so unusual as to attract my attention. I soon discovered a piece of cotton string hanging from the bush, to which one end was tightly fastened. Now what do you suppose the robin was doing ? Trying to get the string ? Yes, he was. He first seized it in his bill and began to fly away ; but in a moment the string jerked him back. Again and again he repeated the attempt with the same result. Then he seized the string again, and having walked backward as far as he could, he tugged, and pulled, and jerked, now this way, now that way, but all in vain. I tell you, boys, I began to feel a great interest in that robin. I at once respected him. I awoke my boys speedily, and called them into my chamber to see this wonderful robin. And we all looked and looked for a long time to see the beautiful bird fly and tug and pull, and try one way and another to get that bit of string off the rose-bush. I began to fear that the plucky little fellow would have to abandon his effort in despair ; because, you see, I began to compare him with some of my school boys, and thought that they, in his place, would have given up long before. Not a bit of it. That robin worked away, and worked away, without resting a moment, until after a very long trial, he made one mighty effort, and away he flew triumphantly with the string in his bill. In a minute that string was woven into his nest, which if found, no boy in this school, I am sure will disturb.

Boys, how do you like my picture ? First rate. I'm glad you like it. Can't we get some good lessons from it. I think it teaches an excellent lesson. What is it, John ? Perseverance. Good ! That's just the lesson. Now, boys, that robin shall be schoolmaster here a few minutes. Right here on my table stands master robin. O, you needn't laugh. Just imagine that you see master robin right here making a polite bow and saying, "Good morning, young gentlemen." As you don't understand his language, I will act as interpreter. "I am requested to say a few words to you on the subject of perseverance. I don't know much what you study here, because my early education was neglected; but I do know, my friends, that to do anything well you must persevere. I have hard work to make my nest in the flowery spring. You saw how long a time and how much hard work it cost me, this morning to get a bit of string. Now just think how many strings, and shreds, and straws, I have to pick up for my nest. Then how much labor it takes to put them snugly together, so as to hold safely my pretty blue eggs, and, by and by, my wee little children. It needs perseverance, boys, to do what I have to do, and let me tell you that poor ignorant robins always practice what I am now teaching. You have your hard work to do, I suppose ; all I can say to you is, Persevere, boys ; persevere, persevere. Don't steal my eggs, nor stone my nest. Good by, boys, good by."

There ; master robin has flown out of the window. You don't often hear a bird talk like that, do you ? He made a sensible little speech, didn't he ? I hope that some of you will profit by it.—Massachusetts Teacher.

A MOTHER TURNED OUT TO DIE.

Do you see that poor woman upon whom those men are looking so earnestly ? She was found in the woods, far away from any village, by Mr. Moffat, a missionary in Africa. She was old, and thin, and weak, so weak she could not stand up. When she saw Mr. Moffat she was frightened, for she had never seen a white man before. But he spoke kindly to her and said :

"My mother, fear not ; we are friends ; we will do you no harm. How came you in this desolate place ?"

After recovering her courage, the poor creature replied : "I have been here four days! My children have left me here to die."

"Your children?" exclaimed the missionary.

"Yes," she said ; "my own children, my three sons and two daughters. They have gone away to yonder blue mountain and have left me here to die."

"Why did they leave you ?"

Spreading out her bony hands she replied : "I am old, you see, and therefore I am no longer able to serve them. When they kill game I am too feeble to help carry the flesh ; I am not able to gather wood for their fire, and I can no longer carry their children on my back as I used to do."

"Are you not afraid of the lions ?" asked Mr. Moffat with tears in his eyes.

"I am so thin there is nothing on my bones for the lions to eat, and they wont take the trouble to touch me," said she.

Mr. Moffat would have taken her with him to his home, but he could not. So he left her some food, placed wood for her fire, and promised to return and get her as soon as possible.

After he left, her heartless children heard that Mr. Moffat had visited her, and fearing that he might be some mighty chief who would punish them for their cruelty, they went after her and took care of her as long as she lived. —Adventures of a Missionary.

DEATH.

BY DR. JOHN FONDEY.

"And there shall be no more death."—Rev. xxi. 4.

In our text death is represented, among other things, as having no existence in that new heaven and earth, which the Christian is to enjoy as his eternal possession. The positive blessing of the presence of God in that glorious tabernacle or dwelling place, the New Jerusalem, is, in the context, most solemnly promised; whilst the negative blessing of the absence of tears, and death, and sorrow, and crying, and pain, is just as sacredly assured to him.

Not among the least of these negative blessings is the absence of death in that world of happiness and love. Should death indeed enter that holy world,—were the joy and peace which filled the breast of the ransomed soul in danger of being suspended at any moment by the appearance of the last dread enemy,—were the songs of praise that were pealing in loud and exulting notes from the hearts and voices of the redeemed, liable to be suddenly stilled and hushed forever,—were the soul exposed to the danger of being sundered from the side, and excluded from the presence of its God, the happiness and the glory of that better world would be but incomplete—the certainty that these enjoyments would soon end,—that there was nothing of permanency connected with them, would operate as a constant source of anxiety and unhappiness, and throw a shadow, a cloud over the heart, which not all the bright and dazzling magnificence of that holy city, nor even the presence of its God could ever dissipate.

Death, even in this world, where it seems to harmonize in some measure with the pain and suffering, the sorrow and tears, which mark the pathway of its unhappy inhabitants, is, after all, but a dreaded enemy; but death in the New Jerusalem, and amid all the rapture and glory of that blessed home, would not only be an event out of harmony with the place, but one whose advent would be hailed with feelings far surpassing in horror those with which in the present condition of things it is regarded. It would be as if, amid the noonday brightness of an unclouded sky, darkness like that of Egypt should suddenly overshadow the earth; and, while the heart was heaving under the pleasing load of happiness and glory, as if mountains of agony should be piled like the vast weight of a universe upon the spirit—imagination could not paint the horror, nor express the dread, which the approach of death in that bright world would awaken in the soul of the just now happy and and exulting christian.

But, blessed be God, we have the assurance of him who cannot lie, that death shall never enter the future home of the righteous; neither shall sorrow, nor crying, nor tears, nor pain: —these belong to a dispensation in which sin and misery exist, but find no place in a world where all will be holiness, and happiness, and love.

Let us then consider the subject of death, that we may form some idea of the influence which its absence will have, in swelling the amount of happiness of which the christian will be a partaker hereafter.

We know not whether on any other of the worlds that have sprung from the hands of the Creator, death has found an entrance, or exercised its power. Ample proof is, however, afforded by science, that on the globe which we inhabit death has for ages claimed its victims. Long before the period denominated the six days' creation of the world, and of man—ages on ages in the past, death reigned. On this subject inspiration gives us no light, but science has revealed to us the the fact that, far back in past eternity, this our globe existed and death triumphed.

From the developments of Geology we learn that, in what are called the oldest of the sedimentary rocks, (by which are meant those rocks which have been formed out of materials deposited from a state of suspension in water,) and which were deposited many ages back,—long before the creation of man, or the commencement of the Mosaic six days' creation,—the remains of animals occur in vast numbers, which no one can doubt are the relics of what once constituted living beings. We find in the whole series of these rocks, six miles in thickness, similar remains, which increase in numbers as we ascend towards the surface of the earth; but we find no remains of man until we reach the very highest stratum, or layer of earth, the mere superficial coat of alluvium. In this last we find the remains of human beings. Those original beings or animals, lying imbeded in those thick rocks below the surface of the earth or alluvium, must have perished by death long before the sentence was executed on man, "Dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return." That these animals existed and perished long before man lived upon the earth, is proved also from the fact that the remains of man are not found among them; although his bony structure is equally capable of preservation with theirs. Of the 10,000 species of animals dug out of the rocks below alluvium, no relic of man has been found. Those ancient animals differ too, so much from man and animals now existing on the globe, that comparative anatomy, with its sure laws, shows us that both races could not live and flourish in the same world,—that the world which was suitable for the existence of the one race was not for that of the other.

But not only did death reign in those long past ages of our world, as indicated by the developments of Geology, but that death was violent and painful in its character. Among animals now in existence there are large tribes which have received the name of carnivorous or flesh eating, who possess organs that are designed for the express purpose of enabling them to destroy other animals, and of course to inflict on them violent and painful death. Now we find among those animals that are imbeded in rocks, tribes exactly similar in like proportion; not that they were always the same tribes, but when one class disappeared, another was created to take its place, to keep down the excessive multiplication of other races; which indeed seems to be the great object intended to be accomplished by them. And as evidence that animals of such a peculiar organization not only lived in the ages preceding man's creation, but that they actually destroyed other animals who lived during the same period of their own existence, we find among these fossils that one animal encloses in its own body the remains of another animal that had been devoured by it for food; both animals being now converted into solid rock,—proving to minds the most skeptical that, ages before man's transgression, death occurred, and in a violent manner among the animals who existed at that remote period on the earth.

As we have said, no evidence is presented us in the remains of animals found in the rocks of our earth that intelligent beings, similar, or analogous to man, existed in the world before he was created. Not that in the age just preceding the Mosaic six days' creation, such beings may not have existed, and without death have been removed from the globe. Geology, however, affords us no proof, drawn from the examination of the strata of the rocks, that such beings had an existence, and inspiration is silent on the subject.

It is not improbable, however, that some of the angels, including Satan, in the age that preceded the remewal of the earth, or the time when it was fitted up for the residence of man, may here have had their residence. We find, according to Jude, that the sin of Satan, and his evil coadjutors consisted in their not keeping their first estate, and in leaving their habitations. To Satan may have been entrusted the chief domain over the earth in that age, as to Adam was given the dominion over the earth in his age. On their apostacy, their removal may have been effected from the earth;—the holy angels, or those who remained obedient, being rewarded by placing them in a condition of still higher honor and glory, while the wicked angels, including their arch head, were degraded and cast out from the spot which they had desecrated.

The earth of that age was then probably thrown into a state of chaos, in which condition it remained until the period when the Mosaic six days' account commences; at which time the earth was renewed, and that order and arrangement of things adopted, spoken of as being effected during the six days in which God was *re*creating, or renewing the earth. The first verse of the 1st chapter of Genesis gives us information of the fact that, in the beginning, or in the beginning of creation, at which time God created all things, the earth itself, as well as the heavens were created. Without stopping to mention what transpired after that event, and which it was not necessary for us to know, Moses then takes up the subject of the *re*creation of the world in six days. During the interval that occurred between the first or original creation of the earth, and the period of its *re*creation, the earth was thrown into a state of chaos; a condition which must, apparently, have occurred in consequence of some circumstances of a grave and solemn character. The wickedness of men led to that great change which the earth experienced at the time of the Deluge,—it was sin that led to the occurrence of that event, and may not the sin of the angelic hosts, as indicated by their disobedience and rebellion, have resulted in the Almighty's sweeping them from the earth, and bringing its uper strata into a state of chaos. And if Satan once, while holy, had dominion over this world, may not this account for the anxiety and perseverance he has manifested in seeking to retain the power, and authority over it, which at this present period he possesses? Not only under this view, was it a wish on his part to thwart the purposes of the Almighty, but it was also an anxiety and determination to regain a dominion which had been wrested from him, that led him to seek the ruin of man, and the introduction of sin and misery into the world. The reason for the interference of Satan in the concerns of this our world would thus be very apparent—we would not, however, on a matter concerning which revelation has been altogether silent, presume to present the ideas which we have advanced as founded on the teachings of inspiration, but as those which give a probable solution of some of the difficulties which may present themselves in connection with the subject under consideration.

From what has been said it will be perceived that death reigned upon this globe ages before it was *re*created, and reformed out of the condition of chaos into which it was thrown at some period prior to this era of its renewal.

Has death however been an event incident to the condition and history of animals and man since this period of the *re*creation of the earth took place? Most probably it has, so far as animals are concerned. Analogy would go to show that this was the case. If, before the chaotic state was ushered in, animals died, as indicated by their fossil remains which are found imbedded in such vast numbers in the sedimentary rocks, we have reason to conclude that such also would in all probability, be the result with reference to those animals which have existed upon this earth since the six days' creation. It seems to be a wise provision of Providence that animals should be removed by death, thereby preventing such an increase in numbers as would, if unchecked, have a tendency to thwart the fulfilment of the command originally given to man, to be fruitful, and multiply, and fill up the earth. Animals require so much larger space of earth than man for the growth of those materials that are necessary for their sustenance, that a vast increase in their numbers would render an appropriation of so much of the earth's surface necessary for their support, that man would not be able to reserve a sufficient quantity to make provision for his own increase, and thus the divine command for him to fill up the world would be thwarted. The removal however of animals by death, would prevent their too great increase, and obviate the difficulties in the way of man's numerical development. We have put the question in the above shape, supposing that man himself would have been exempt from death, which would have been the case had he not sinned.

Whether, however, death would have ensued so far as animals are concerned, even supposing man had not sinned, we are, we believe, warranted by scripture in asserting that death, so far as man is interested, is the result of sin. "In the day thou eatest thereof," said God, alluding to the tree of knowledge of good and evil, "dying thou shalt die." The day here spoken of was a Millenial day, or a period of 1000 years; at some point of time in which, man, if he disobeyed the commandment of his God, should die. He was, from the hour he transgressed, to become a dying creature, and finally cease to live before he had completed 1000 years of his existence. This threatening of the Almighty was fulfilled. Adam failed to live out a millenial day—he lived 930 years—then the curse, pronounced on him in the garden if he sinned, took effect, and he returned again to the earth out of which he had been taken. That death, so far as man is concerned, is the result of sin, is the doctrine clearly taught by the apostle to the Gentiles. "Wherefore," says he, in the Epistle to the Romans, chap. v. verse, 12, "As by one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin, and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned." It would be useless to multiply words or arguments on this point—the apostle settles the question conclusively, and asserts in language so plain that no one need misunderstand it, that death entered into the world, and passed on man, in consequence of sin.

Our subject suggests a few thoughts solemn and interesting in their character. Death, as we have seen, is a wise provision of Providence so far as animals are concerned, by checking their too great increase, which would interfere with the multiplication of the human species. So far too, as regards man, death is also a wise arangement of the Deity. Fallen as man is, he has become the subject of weaknesses and infirmities of body, that occasion much suffering both physical and mental He might be as holy as Enoch, yet if he were to live as long as Adam, pressed down at the same time by the burden of his infirmities, he would feel existence at length to become a weary load, and long for the quiet and repose of the silent grave. Like Job, in the bitterness of his soul, he would exclaim, "My soul is weary of my life; I loathe it, I would not live alway. O that thou wouldest hide me in the grave, that thou wouldest keep me secret until thy wrath be past, that thou wouldest appoint me a set time and remember me." With him also the christian can exclaim, "I know that my Redeemer liveth, and that he shall stand at the latter day upon the earth, and though after my skin worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God, whom I shall see for myself, and mine eyes shall behold, and not another, though my reins be consumed within me." He knows and is persuaded, that nothing can separate him from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus his Lord; and, looking for the Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ, he expects when he shall appear to appear with him in glory—to have his vile body changed that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body, according to the working, whereby he is able even to subdue all things unto himself. With holy resignation, yet with ardent hope, can the tired, war worn soldier of the cross look forward to death, realizing that in the quiet grave he will enjoy a peaceful slumber, until the period when the voice of the archangel, and the trump of God shall wake him from his sleep, and, clothed in a glorious body which shall never know pain, sickness, infirmity, or death, he shall dwell forever with his God.

Death is, furthermore, a wise provision of the Deity, inasmuch as it tends to prevent sin from gaining that strength and power which it would be likely to obtain, were men to live without limit to their existence. Wisdom is learned by experience—the lips of age should keep knowledge, and an advanced christian should be well skilled in matters connected with the divine life. His confidence in God, his ability to resist temptation, his capacity to discard and ward off the assaults of the adversary, his resignation, submission, love, and joy, should increase as he becomes acquainted with heavenly things; and a soul that lives up to its duties and privilges, will realize this progression, and increase in strength, the further it advances on its way towards the heavenly Jerusalem.

This law of increase in wisdom and strength, and skill, through age and experience, is no less operative considered with reference to its bearings on the character and influence of the sinner. The farther he advances in his way of unholiness, the more strength does sin acquire over him, and the more strength and skill does he acquire to sin. What was once a wayward impulse becomes at length a settled and determined habit—thoughts, feelings, and desires, all move at length in harmony with the will of Satan, and a skill is acquired through age and experience that renders a long hardened transgressor a most valuable coadjutor in carrying out the dictates of the arch enemy of souls. Let that sinner live on for ages, growing in knowledge and power to blight and blast, to defile and to corrupt, and you have an enemy to God who becomes more qualified to work mischief, and increase the sum of human misery. To cut that sinner off by death, after he had spent but a few years in working the work of iniquity, would be a blessing to himself, by preventing him from heaping up a high mountain of transgression and laying up for himself wrath against the day of wrath and revelation of the righteous judgment of God. His being cut off would also be a blessing by checking him in his course of injury to the souls of others, multitudes of whom would, if sufficient time were afforded him, fall victims to his subtle arts and devices.

Considered in these aspects, death then becomes a desirable event, both saint and sinner realizing great advantages from it—the one being relieved by it from a warfare that is arduous, and which, often, from infirmities and sufferings, presses most weightily upon the spirit—the other being prevented from doing as much mischief, and heaping up as great a load of transgression, as he would if permitted to live a life whose duration was long protracted.

If, dying sinner, you are among the number of those who shall be finally impenitent, arraign not in that hour the justice or goodness of God in early cutting you down, but rejoice that you were not permitted to swell still higher your load of guilt, and to work still greater ruin than you had already effected.

Out Oh ! remember that death is not all which you have to fear—it has but little in itself really dreadful, if sin its sting has been removed. It is not the circumstances connected with the act of dying, painful though these may sometimes be, that makes death so terrible—it is the remaining forever under the power and dominion of the grave that gives to death its aspect of dread and horror. If you forsake your sins, and are resolutely determined henceforth to serve God—if you cast yourself upon his mercy, trusting not in your own works or merits, but relying only on the merits of his dearly beloved Son, you may greet death with a smile on your face, and with joy in your heart, realizing that not even this last enemy can separate you from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus your Lord. Come then in this favored hour, make him who alone can enable you to triumph over death your friend, and enjoy the blessed assurance that you will yet one day be safe from its grasp and shielded from its power forever.

Fellow-christians ! through Jesus we shall come off conquerors over death. United to Christ by a living faith, we, like him, shall triumph over this last dread enemy. The grave may hold us in its dark mansions with strong arm and mighty power, but Jesus has vanquished this our foe, and assured us that we also shall conquer through his strength. From yonder heavens, like the swift flashing lightning, Jesus, our glorious Saviour shall descend. The voice, which, at the grave of Lazarus, was heard, bidding the tyrant who retained this loved disciple in his iron grasp, and bade the brother of the weeping sisters come forth from his cold silent bed, shall break upon the ears of all his saints, who lie in their dark gloomy graves ; and like a mighty host, glorious in form, and shining in brightness like the firmament, and like those orbs that deck the vast expanse above, shall spring to life, and raise an anthem that shall swell like the voice of a vast multitude, and as the sound of many waters, and of mighty thunderings, till, through the universe of God, the song caught up by every creature of his power shall rise, of "glory, honor, power, and might, be unto him that sitteth on the throne, and to the Lamb forever and forever."

In yonder home, the tabernacle of our God, the New Jerusalem, we too shall dwell, safe from all fear of death, for God himself shall dwell with men, and wipe away all tears from every eye, "and there shall be no more death, neither sorrow, nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain, for the former things have passed away." Let us live in constant preparation for the coming of our Lord, then shall eternal life be ours, and we shall share in all the glory of his throne, and be forever the partners of his bliss.

LINES.

BY MARIA MATTHEWS WEAVER.

From earth's storms O let me hide
By my dear Redeemer's side,
Let me find a refuge there,
Let me in his glory share.

Let me lean on his strong arm
When I see approaching harm,
When I faint in life's rough way,
May he be my staff and stay.

When life's cares oppress my soul—
O'er my feet dark waters roll,
When the world grows dark as night,
May He shed his holy light.

Saviour bless me, even me,
Let me thy salvation see;
Lead me gently by thy hand
To the bright and better land.

BEYOND THE GARDEN-GATE.

"Children," said Mrs. Jay, "you may play anywhere in the yard, but don't go beyond the garden-gate. Do you hear me, Peter?" "Yes, mother," said Peter, looking up from his wheel-barrow: "Do not go beyond the garden-gate!" Mother then, seeing her little boy and girl quietly at play in the yard, put on her bonnet and shawl, and went down the street.

Peter and Jessie, his little sister, had nice plays together. He used to make believe horse, and draw her on his trucks, or she make believe a pumpkin, and be carred in his wheel-barrow; or they would both make believe cows and set up a terrible mooing; indeed, there was no end to the different characters they took, all the while keeping very kind to each other. Their plays this afternoon led them down to the bottom of the garden, where there was a gate, hasped inside, which opened into a field of thick underbrush and trees, sloping down to a lower part of the village. This was the forbidden gate.

"I wish we could go out into the wood's," said Peter; "perhaps we should find a bird's nest." Peter unhasped the gate, and he and Jessie looked around and saw the pretty woods. "But what did mother tell us?" asked Jessie. "Perhaps she was afraid of bears," answered Peter, "or the water in these woods, or something; but there are no bears. Oh! there's a squirrel on that tree! See him, see him, Jessie;" and away ran Peter to the woods, and away ran Jessie after him. The squirrel hid, and the children went on, hoping to find another. They strayed down a bank, and came to a brook and little pond. "Mother thought we'd fall into this pond, and that's the reason she cautioned us against coming here," said Peter; "but we shan't, shall we, Jessie?" "No," answered Jessie, "we won't." And so they ran round, and tumbled about, and picked flowers, and at last got back to the garden-gate safe and unharmed, without anybody knowing they went. "Jessie," said P ter, "don't you tell." Not if mother asks?" asked Jessie. "She won't ask," said Peter.

Mother did not ask, nor did Jessie tell, and all went on at home as usual. Saturday night, after the children were washed, and Jessie had gone to sleep, Peter and his mother talked a little longer together, as they often did on Saturday night. Peter said: "Mother I have been in the woods beyond the garden-gate this week." "When did you go?" she asked. He told her. "And mother," he said, "nothing happened to us there; we didn't fall into the water, or get wet, or tear our clothes; no bears ate us up. Why didn't you want us to go?"

"You lost something that afternoon in the woods," said his mother. "Lost something!" said Peter; and he thought of his knife, and his slate pencils, and his ball, and a three-cent piece in his pocket; he hadn't lost one of them, he was quite sure. "Yes," repeated his mother, "think a moment what you have missed, for I know you have lost something." Peter for a moment thought his mother must be a spirit; for how could she know when he didn't know himself? "You will recollect if you think," said she. Peter put his head under the bed-quilt, for he began to see he had lost something; and the more he thought, the more sure he was of it. "Mother," he at last said in a little sorrowful voice, "I did lose something in those woods, I did; I lost the happy out of my heart." Ah, that was it; and a sad loss it is when a child loses the happy out of his heart.

It does not always concern a child to know why his parents forbid him this or that; his duty is obedience. Nor because nothing befalls him in a course of disobedience, must he conclude no harm is done at all. Peter and Jessie got home safely; but was there no harm done? Yes, yes; the happy left their hearts. They were afraid—afraid their mother would find it out. This is the way doing wrong wrongs you. It wrongs you out of that peace and comfort which God made you to enjoy; and all Peter's play in the woods did not make up for this loss until he told his mother and received her forgiveness with her good-night kiss.

THE PERSEVERING ROBIN.

As I looked out of my chamber window quite early—earlier than perhaps some of you looked out of yours—I saw under a large rose-bush a beautiful robin, whose wings, all sparkling with dew-drops, looked as fresh as the bright spring green.

The movements of the robin were so unusual as to attract my attention. I soon discovered a piece of cotton string hanging from the bush, to which one end was tightly fastened. Now what do you suppose the robin was doing? Trying to get the string? Yes, he was. He first seized it in his bill and began to fly away; but in a moment the string jerked him back. Again and again he repeated the attempt with the same result. Then he seized the string again, and having walked backward as far as he could, he tugged, and pulled, and jerked, now this way, now that way, but all in vain. I tell you, boys, I began to feel a great interest in that robin. I at once respected him. I awoke my boys speedily, and called them into my chamber to see this wonderful robin. And we all looked and looked for a long time to see the beautiful bird fly and tug and pull, and try one way and another to get that bit of string off the rose-bush. I began to fear that the plucky little fellow would have to abandon his effort in despair; because, you see, I began to compare him with some of my school boys, and thought that they, in his place, would have given up long before. Not a bit of it. That robin worked away, and worked away, without resting a moment, until after a very long trial, he made one mighty effort, and away he flew triumphantly with the string in his bill. In a minute that string was woven into his nest, which if found, no boy in this school, I am sure will disturb.

Boys, how do you like my picture? First rate. I'm glad you like it. Can't we get some good lessons from it. I think it teaches an excellent lesson. What is it, John? Perseverance. Good! That's just the lesson. Now, boys that robin shall be schoolmaster here a few minutes. Right here on my table stands master robin. O, you needn't laugh. Just imagine that you see master robin right here making a polite bow and saying, "Good morning, young gentlemen." As you don't understand his language, I will act as interpreter. "I am requested to say a few words to you on the subject of perseverance. I don't know much what you study here, because my early education was neglected; but I do know, my friends, that to do anything well you must persevere. I have hard work to make my nest in the flowery spring. You saw how long a time and how much hard work it cost me, this morning to get a bit of string. Now just think how many strings, and shreds, and straws, I have to pick up for my nest. Then how much labor it takes to put them snugly together, so as to hold safely my pretty blue eggs, and, by and by, my wee little children. It needs perseverance, boys, to do what I have to do, and let me tell you that poor ignorant robins always practice what I am now teaching. You have your hard work to do, I suppose; all I can say to you is, Persevere, boys; persevere, persevere. Don't steal my eggs, nor stone my nest. Good by, boys, good by."

There; master robin has flown out of the window. You don't often hear a bird talk like that, do you? He made a sensible little speech, didn't he? I hope that some of you will profit by it.—Massachusetts Teacher.

A MOTHER TURNED OUT TO DIE.

Do you see that poor woman upon whom those men are looking so earnestly? She was found in the woods, far away from any village, by Mr. Moffat, a missionary in Africa. She was old, and thin, and weak, so weak she could not stand up. When she saw Mr. Moffat she was frightened, for she had never seen a white man before. But he spoke kindly to her and said:

"My mother, fear not; we are friends; we will do you no harm. How came you in this desolate place?"

After recovering her courage, the poor creature replied: "I have been here four days! My children have left me here to die."

"Your children?" exclaimed the missionary.

"Yes," she said; "my own children, my three sons and two daughters. They have gone away to yonder blue mountain and have left me here to die."

"Why did they leave you?"

Spreading out her bony hands she replied: "I am old, you see, and therefore I am no longer able to serve them. When they kill game I am too feeble to help carry the flesh; I am not able to gather wood for their fire, and I can no longer carry their children on my back as I used to do."

"Are you not afraid of the lions?" asked Mr. Moffat with tears in his eyes.

"I am so thin there is nothing on my bones for the lions to eat, and they wont take the trouble to touch me," said she.

Mr. Moffat would have taken her with him to his home, but he could not. So he left her some food, placed wood for her fire, and promised to return and get her as soon as possible.

After he left, her heartless children heard that Mr. Moffat had visited her, and fearing that he might be some mighty chief who would punish them for their cruelty, they went after her and took care of her as long as she lived. —Adventures of a Missionary.

DEATH.

BY DR. JOHN FONDEY.

"And there shall be no more death."—Rev. xxi. 4.

In our text death is represented, among other things, as having no existence in that new heaven and earth, which the Christian is to enjoy as his eternal possession. The positive blessing of the presence of God in that glorious tabernacle or dwelling place, the New Jerusalem, is, in the context, most solemnly promised; whilst the negative blessing of the absence of tears, and death, and sorrow, and crying, and pain, is just as sacredly assured to him.

Not among the least of these negative blessings is the absence of death in that world of happiness and love. Should death indeed enter that holy world,—were the joy and peace which filled the breast of the ransomed soul in danger of being suspended at any moment by the appearance of the last dread enemy,—were the songs of praise that were pealing in loud and exulting notes from the hearts and voices of the redeemed, liable to be suddenly stilled and hushed forever,—were the soul exposed to the danger of being sundered from the side, and excluded from the presence of its God, the happiness and the glory of that better world would be but incomplete—the certainty that these enjoyments would soon end,—that there was nothing of permanency connected with them, would operate as a constant source of anxiety and unhappiness, and throw a shadow, a cloud over the heart, which not all the bright and dazzling magnificence of that holy city, nor even the presence of its God could ever dissipate.

Death, even in this world, where it seems to harmonize in some measure with the pain and suffering, the sorrow and tears, which mark the pathway of its unhappy inhabitants, is, after all, but a dreaded enemy; but death in the New Jerusalem, and amid all the rapture and glory of that blessed home, would not only be an event out of harmony with the place, but one whose advent would be hailed with feelings far surpassing in horror those with which in the present condition of things it is regarded. It would be as if, amid the noonday brightness of an unclouded sky, darkness like that of Egypt should suddenly overshadow the earth; and, while the heart was heaving under the pleasing load of happiness and glory, as if mountains of agony should be piled like the vast weight of a universe upon the spirit—imagination could not paint the horror, nor express the dread, which the approach of death in that bright world would awaken in the soul of the just now happy and and exulting christian.

But, blessed be God, we have the assurance of him who cannot lie, that death shall never enter the future home of the righteous; neither shall sorrow, nor crying, nor tears, nor pain:—these belong to a dispensation in which sin and misery exist, but find no place in a world where all will be holiness, and happiness, and love.

Let us then consider the subject of death, that we may form some idea of the influence which its absence will have, in swelling the amount of happiness of which the christian will be a partaker hereafter.

We know not whether on any other of the worlds that have sprung from the hands of the Creator, death has found an entrance, or exercised its power. Ample proof is, however, afforded by science, that on the globe which we inhabit death has for ages claimed its victims. Long before the period denominated the six days' creation of the world, and of man—ages on ages in the past, death reigned. On this subject inspiration gives us no light, but science has revealed to us the the fact that, far back in past eternity, this our globe existed and death triumphed.

From the developments of Geology we learn that, in what are called the oldest of the sedimentary rocks, (by which are meant those rocks which have been formed out of materials deposited from a state of suspension in water,) and which were deposited many ages back,—long before the creation of man, or the commencement of the Mosaic six days' creation,—the remains of animals occur in vast numbers, which no one can doubt are the relics of what once constituted living beings. We find in the whole series of these rocks, six miles in thickness, similar remains, which increase in numbers as we ascend towards the surface of the earth; but we find no remains of man until we reach the very highest stratum, or layer of earth, the mere superficial coat of alluvium. In this last we find the remains of human beings. Those original beings or animals, lying imbeded in those thick rocks below the surface of the earth or alluvium, must have perished by death long before the sentence was executed on man, "Dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return." That these animals existed and perished long before man lived upon the earth, is proved also from the fact that the remains of man are not found among them; although his bony structure is equally capable of preservation with theirs. Of the 10,000 species of animals dug out of the rocks below alluvium, no relic of man has been found. Those ancient animals differ too, so much from man and animals now existing on the globe, that comparative anatomy, with its sure laws, shows us that both races could not live and flourish in the same world,—that the world which was suitable for the existence of the one race was not for that of the other.

But not only did death reign in those long past ages of our world, as indicated by the developments of Geology, but that death was violent and painful in its character. Among animals now in existence there are large tribes which have received the name of carnivorous or flesh eating, who possess organs that are designed for the express purpose of enabling them to destroy other animals, and of course to inflict on them violent and painful death. Now we find among those animals that are imbeded in rocks, tribes exactly similar in like proportion; not that they were always the same tribes, but when one class disappeared, another was created to take its place, to keep down the excessive multiplication of other races; which indeed seems to be the great object intended to be accomplished by them. And as evidence that animals of such a peculiar organization not only lived in the ages preceding man's creation, but that they actually destroyed other animals who lived during the same period of their own existence, we find among these fossils that one animal encloses in its own body the remains of another animal that had been devoured by it for food; both animals being now converted into solid rock,—proving to minds the most skeptical that, ages before man's transgression, death occurred, and in a violent manner among the animals who existed at that remote period on the earth.

As we have said, no evidence is presented us in the remains of animals found in the rocks of our earth that intelligent beings, similar, or analogous to man, existed in the world before he was created. Not that in the age just preceding the Mosaic six days' creation, such beings may not have existed, and without death have been removed from the globe. Geology, however, affords us no proof, drawn from the examination of the strata of the rocks, that such beings had an existence, and inspiration is silent on the subject.

It is not improbable, however, that some of the angels, including Satan, in the age that preceded the remewal of the earth, or the time when it was fitted up for the residence of man, may here have had their residence. We find, according to Jude, that the sin of Satan, and his evil coadjutors consisted in their not keeping their first estate, and in leaving their habitations. To Satan may have been entrusted the chief domain over the earth in that age, as to Adam was given the dominion over the earth in his age. On their apostacy, their removal may have been effected from the earth;—the holy angels, or those who remained obedient, being rewarded by placing them in a condition of still higher honor and glory, while the wicked angels, including their arch head, were degraded and cast out from the spot which they had desecrated.

The earth of that age was then probably thrown into a state of chaos, in which condition it remained until the period when the Mosaic six days' account commences; at which time the earth was renewed, and that order and arrangement of things adopted, spoken of as being effected during the six days in which God was recreating, or renewing the earth. The first verse of the 1st chapter of Genesis gives us information of the fact that, in the beginning, or in the beginning of creation, at which time God created all things, the earth itself, as well as the heavens were created. Without stopping to mention what transpired after that event, and which it was not necessary for us to know, Moses then takes up the subject of the recreation of the world in six days. During the interval that occurred between the first or original creation of the earth, and the period of its recreation, the earth was thrown into a state of chaos; a condition which must, apparently, have occurred in consequence of some circumstances of a grave and solemn character. The wickedness of men led to that great change which the earth experienced at the time of the Deluge,—it was sin that led to the occurrence of that event, and may not the sin of the angelic hosts, as indicated by their disobedience and rebellion, have resulted in the Almighty's sweeping them from the earth, and bringing its uper strata into a state of chaos. And if Satan once, while holy, had dominion over this world, may not this account for the anxiety and perseverance he has manifested in seeking to retain the power, and authority over it, which at this present period he possesses? Not only under this view, was it a wish on his part to thwart the purposes of the Almighty, but it was also an anxiety and determination to regain a dominion which had been wrested from him, that led him to seek the ruin of man, and the introduction of sin and misery into the world. The reason for the interference of Satan in the concerns of this our world would thus be very apparent—we would not, however, on a matter concerning which revelation has been altogether silent, presume to present the ideas which we have advanced as founded on the teachings of inspiration, but as those which give a probable solution of some of the difficulties which may present themselves in connection with the subject under consideration.

From what has been said it will be perceived that death reigned upon this globe ages before it was recreated, and reformed out of the condition of chaos into which it was thrown at some period prior to this era of its renewal.

Has death however been an event incident to the condition and history of animals and man since this period of the recreation of the earth took place? Most probably it has, so far as animals are concerned. Analogy would go to show that this was the case. If, before the chaotic state was ushered in, animals died, as indicated by their fossil remains which are found imbedded in such vast numbers in the sedimentary rocks, we have reason to conclude that such also would in all probability, be the result with reference to those animals which have existed upon this earth since the six days' creation. It seems to be a wise provision of Providence that animals should be removed by death, thereby preventing such an increase in numbers as would, if unchecked, have a tendency to thwart the fulfilment of the command originally given to man, to be fruitful, and multiply, and fill up the earth. Animals require so much larger space of earth than man for the growth of those materials that are necessary for their sustenance, that a vast increase in their numbers would render an appropriation of so much of the earth's surface necessary for their support, that man would not be able to reserve a sufficient quantity to make provision for his own increase, and thus the divine command for him to fill up the world would be thwarted. The removal however of animals by death, would prevent their too great increase, and obviate the difficulties in the way of man's numerical development. We have put the question in the above shape, supposing that man himself would have been exempt from death, which would have been the case had he not sinned.

Whether, however, death would have ensued so far as animals are concerned, even supposing man had not sinned, we are, we believe, warranted by scripture in asserting that death, so far as man is interested, is the result of sin. "In the day thou eatest thereof," said God, alluding to the tree of knowledge of good and evil, "dying thou shalt die." The day here spoken of was a Millenial day, or a period of 1000 years; at some point of time in which, man, if he disobeyed the commandment of his God, should die. He was, from the hour he transgressed, to become a dying creature, and finally cease to live before he had completed 1000 years of his existence. This threatening of the Almighty was fulfilled. Adam failed to live out a millenial day—he lived 930 years—then the curse, pronounced on him in the garden if he sinned, took effect, and he returned again to the earth out of which he had been taken. That death, so far as man is concerned, is the result of sin, is the doctrine clearly taught by the apostle to the Gentiles. "Wherefore," says he, in the Epistle to the Romans, chap. v. verse, 12, "As by one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin, and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned." It would be useless to multiply words or arguments on this point—the apostle settles the question conclusively, and asserts in language so plain that no one need misunderstand it, that death entered into the world, and passed on man, in consequence of sin.

Our subject suggests a few thoughts solemn and interesting in their character. Death, as we have seen, is a wise provision of Providence so far as animals are concerned, by checking their too great increase, which would interfere with the multiplication of the human species. So far too, as regards man, death is also a wise arangement of the Deity. Fallen as man is, he has become the subject of weaknesses and infirmities of body, that occasion much suffering both physical and mental He might be as holy as Enoch, yet if he were to live as long as Adam, pressed down at the same time by the burden of his infirmities, he would feel existence at length to become a weary load, and long for the quiet and repose of the silent grave. Like Job, in the bitterness of his soul, he would exclaim, "My soul is weary of my life; I loathe it, I would not live alway. O that thou wouldest hide me in the grave, that thou wouldest keep me secret until thy wrath be past, that thou wouldest appoint me a set time and remember me." With him also the christian can exclaim, "I know that my Redeemer liveth, and that he shall stand at the latter day upon the earth, and though after my skin worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God, whom I shall see for myself, and mine eyes shall behold, and not another, though my reins be consumed within me." He knows and is persuaded, that nothing can separate him from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus his Lord; and, looking for the Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ, he expects when he shall appear to appear with him in glory—to have his vile body changed that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body, according to the working, whereby he is able even to subdue all things unto himself. With holy resignation, yet with ardent hope, can the tired, war worn soldier of the cross look forward to death, realizing that in the quiet grave he will enjoy a peaceful slumber, until the period when the voice of the archangel, and the trump of God shall wake him from his sleep, and, clothed in a glorious body which shall never know pain, sickness, infirmity, or death, he shall dwell forever with his God.

Death is, furthermore, a wise provision of the Deity, inasmuch as it tends to prevent sin from gaining that strength and power which it would be likely to obtain, were men to live without limit to their existence. Wisdom is learned by experience—the lips of age should keep knowledge, and an advanced christian should be well skilled in matters connected with the divine life. His confidence in God, his ability to resist temptation, his capacity to discard and ward off the assaults of the adversary, his resignation, submission, love, and joy, should increase as he becomes acquainted with heavenly things; and a soul that lives up to its duties and privilges, will realize this progression, and increase in strength, the further it advances on its way towards the heavenly Jerusalem.

This law of increase in wisdom and strength, and skill, through age and experience, is no less operative considered with reference to its bearings on the character and influence of the sinner. The farther he advances in his way of unholiness, the more strength does sin acquire over him, and the more strength and skill does he acquire to sin. What was once a wayward impulse becomes at length a settled and determined habit—thoughts, feelings, and desires, all move at length in harmony with the will of Satan, and a skill is acquired through age and experience that renders a long hardened transgressor a most valuable coadjutor in carrying out the dictates of the arch enemy of souls. Let that sinner live on for ages, growing in knowledge and power to blight and blast, to defile and to corrupt, and you have an enemy to God who becomes more qualified to work mischief, and increase the sum of human misery. To cut that sinner off by death, after he had spent but a few years in working the work of iniquity, would be a blessing to himself, by preventing him from heaping up a high mountain of transgression and laying up for himself wrath against the day of wrath and revelation of the righteous judgment of God. His being cut off would also be a blessing by checking him in his course of injury to the souls of others, multitudes of whom would, if sufficient time were afforded him, fall victims to his subtle arts and devices.

Considered in these aspects, death then becomes a desirable event, both saint and sinner realizing great advantages from it—the one being relieved by it from a warfare that is arduous, and which, often, from infirmities and sufferings, presses most weightily upon the spirit—the other being prevented from doing as much mischief, and heaping up as great a load of transgression, as he would if permitted to live a life whose duration was long protracted.

If, dying sinner, you are among the number of those who shall be finally impenitent, arraign not in that hour the justice or goodness of God in early cutting you down, but rejoice that you were not permitted to swell still higher your load of guilt, and to work still greater ruin than you had already effected.

Out Oh! remember that death is not all which you have to fear—it has but little in itself really dreadful, if sin its sting has been removed. It is not the circumstances connected with the act of dying, painful though these may sometimes be, that makes death so terrible—it is the remaining forever under the power and dominion of the grave that gives to death its aspect of dread and horror. If you forsake your sins, and are resolutely determined henceforth to serve God—if you cast yourself upon his mercy, trusting not in your own works or merits, but relying only on the merits of his dearly beloved Son, you may greet death with a smile on your face, and with joy in your heart, realizing that not even this last enemy can separate you from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus your Lord. Come then in this favored hour, make him who alone can enable you to triumph over death your friend, and enjoy the blessed assurance that you will yet one day be safe from its grasp and shielded from its power forever.

Fellow-christians! through Jesus we shall come off conquerors over death. United to Christ by a living faith, we, like him, shall triumph over this last dread enemy. The grave may hold us in its dark mansions with strong arm and mighty power, but Jesus has vanquished this our foe, and assured us that we also shall conquer through his strength. From yonder heavens, like the swift flashing lightning, Jesus, our glorious Saviour shall descend. The voice, which, at the grave of Lazarus, was heard, bidding the tyrant who retained this loved disciple in his iron grasp, and bade the brother of the weeping sisters come forth from his cold silent bed, shall break upon the ears of all his saints, who lie in their dark gloomy graves; and like a mighty host, glorious in form, and shining in brightness like the firmament, and like those orbs that deck the vast expanse above, shall spring to life, and raise an anthem that shall swell like the voice of a vast multitude, and as the sound of many waters, and of mighty thunderings, till, through the universe of God, the song caught up by every creature of his power shall rise, of "glory, honor, power, and might, be unto him that sitteth on the throne, and to the Lamb forever and forever."

In yonder home, the tabernacle of our God, the New Jerusalem, we too shall dwell, safe from all fear of death, for God himself shall dwell with men, and wipe away all tears from every eye, "and there shall be no more death, neither sorrow, nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain, for the former things have passed away." Let us live in constant preparation for the coming of our Lord, then shall eternal life be ours, and we shall share in all the glory of his throne, and be forever the partners of his bliss.

WESTERN MISSION.—No. 13.

BY W. S. CAMPBELL.

CLYDE, (Post Office, HORNSBY) ILL., August 11, 1865.

A pleasing incident occurred to these pilgrim preachers, in reaching this place, where we are now at work. We left Springfield, at 4.30 A. M., Aug. 4; arrived at Carlinville, the county seat of Macoupin Co., at 6.30; and proceeded to Br. Brailey's, two miles north, and staid during the day. It being excessively warm, we did not get to move to our distant appointment. Br. Brailey's family were very interesting and kind to us, being Advent believers, from the East, a few years since. This is the circumstance, Sister B. would have tea for us. Just as we sat down, that coveted means, a team, came in sight. The kind man would carry us, and would wait till we took some tea, and in due course set us down in the city, just in time for us not to know how we would get across the prairie, (it being now 6, P. M.) but a team was coming which could take us within a fourth of a mile of father Emmons', and they liked us so well that they took us to the very gate of the old gentleman's prairie farm on a free fare. We were happy—were filled with gratitude. We thought of Paul and his companions, who at one time, in their travels, "thanked God and took courage." At Br. Emmons' we were refreshed, lodged, and abundantly provided for; while nature contributed much to my enjoyment, in the picturesque and magnificent scenes, by moonlight and by morning glory, which she gave us. We walked next morning across a narrow place, in this large prairie, some three miles, and found some dear brethren of our "own company."

The country is flat, just here; but rolling, in every direction southward and northward it is open; and I am told that towards Chicago, in the general direction, there is no timber for 300 miles. From a building here, I can see eighteen or twenty miles each way. The globular character of the earth is distinctly recognized. Enough.

From these grand views of the natural world, we come to consider still farther, the moral position which we occupy here. Our Tent, not having arrived, and being refused an empty meeting house, we began our meetings, on Sunday 6th, in a school house. We had a very good attendance, and some interest began as soon as our labors commenced. There is some stir among the more intellectual portion of the community, as we endeavor to establish the real philosophy of man's existence.

That I might not fail to be posted, (which one finds a very important thing in the West, always,) I went with a brother across the farms, to the timber, where a quiet meeting-house is located, in a fine grove, to listen to the Rev. Mr. Baker, who was, I learned, to preach at 11 a. m., on the spirit of man. I did hear him. The style of the meeting was real old fashioned Methodist. To this, of course, I could make no objection. Indeed I enjoyed the service much. I was pleased with the sermon, i. e., I was glad to see the brother declare his honest convictions, in an honest way; but the ground was untenable, the arguments unsound, the whole philosophy of the lecture at fault, and the main reliance for proof of the existence of a separate entity in man, called spirit, placed on the feeling which is within, susceptible of an influence from the Spirit of God. It was suggested that the reason why some did not believe in the "spirit man" was that they were carnally minded. Rather strange that an intelligent man, who has a deathless spirit, should not know it when that very intelligence is made the principal reason why all men are conscious of it, and some, therefore, believe it. The shaft was smartly aimed, but fell far short of its mark. I design a brief review of the discourse, for circulation, by means of extra copies, among those who heard it.

There are those in this town who are coming to the views of Bible truth that it is our privilege to present to them; and some are holding back, we understand, till we are away, then they are going to root up what we have planted: well now, we shall give them an opportunity to do all that they may wish to, in that direction, and in a much easier way. We court inquiry, not only here but everywhere. Not from the Methodist and Baptist brethren only, but Adventists—from all.

I find that the field is great in this part of the State. We can do but little for want of time. The harvest is plenteous.

WE should study to be wise, not above Scripture, but in Scripture; to learn, not the things which God has concealed, but what he has revealed.—Bishop Whately.

EXPOSITION OF 1 TIM. IV. 10.

BY ELD. F. H. BURBANK.

"For therefore we both labor and suffer reproach, because we trust in the living God, who is the Saviour of all men, especially of those that believe."

The meaning of the Apostle is simply this: that "God sent not his Son into the world to condemn the world, but that the world through him might be saved." Christ having died for the sins of the world, salvation is offered to the whole world by God. The word preached is, "God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." Therefore in order to be saved, all must "believe on the Lord Jesus Christ." In this manner, and in this manner only, is "God the Saviour of all men, especially of them that believe."

A HETERODOX VIEW.

The heterodox view of "the common salvation," and the special salvation, is, that believers and unbelievers will be raised from the dead at the last day. That, they call "the common salvation,"—the salvation of all men. Believers, after being raised from the dead will not die any more, and their salvation is a special, an "eternal salvation."

THE COMMON SALVATION.

"The common salvation," is a phrase used by Jude, which means no more than that the salvation of Jews and Gentiles would be by Jesus Christ, "for there is no other name under heaven given among men whereby we must saved." Thus the circumcision must be justified by faith, and the "uncircumcision through faith," for "by grace are (we) saved through faith." That makes it "the common salvation," for salvation is not only brought to the Jews, but also to the Gentiles, who were "in time past without Christ, having no hope, and without God in the world....For he is our peace, who hath made both (Jews and Gentiles) one, and hath broken down the middle wall of partition between us....Now therefore ye are no more strangers and foreigners, but fellow-citizens with the saints, and of the household of God; and are built upon the foundation of the apostles and Prophets," etc. So much, for "the common salvation" which is to be obtained through "the common faith" of Jews and Gentiles.

THE SPECIAL SALVATION.

"We trust in God, who is the Saviour of all men, specially of them that believe." God is the Saviour of all men, because he has offered salvation, not only to Jews but to the Gentiles. Hence the invitation, "Come unto me all ye ends of the earth and be saved." It does not follow that all will be saved, unless all come to Christ. Furthermore, this salvation is a promise, and being a promise it is a subject of hope. Hence the apostle says, "We are saved by hope." If all men will have salvation at the coming of Christ the Saviour, then all men, saints and sinners, can say they have a "hope of salvation," and the apostle's "helmet" would be worn by the the ungodly.

If, "God, who is the Saviour of all men," is quoted to prove the salvation of wicked men by a resurrection from the dead, then the passage, "God....will have all men to be saved, and to come to the knowledge of the truth," proves that no one will be lost; for, "if our Gospel be hid, it is hid to them that are lost." If they "come to the knowledge of the truth," then the Gospel is not hid from them; and the legitimate conclusion from such premises would be, the "eternal salvation of all men." To "finish up" the argument upon such premises, we might add that God is "not willing that any should perish." Hear the conclusion of such reasoning. "God is the Saviour of all men," hence he "will have all men to be saved, and, to come to the knowledge of the truth." Whoever likes such assertions is welcome to them; but as long as "Faith" is taught in the Bible as the only way by which we may obtain salvation, so long, by the grace of God, will I contend for the only gospel ground of salvation.

SAVED FROM WHAT?

I answer, saved from death, even eternal death, the penalty of transgression. When any one can show me from the Scriptures that a law could be given which could give life, any life whatever, then I will recede from the position I stand upon, and not until then. Some object to the phrase "eternal death" because it is not found in the Bible. With as much propriety I can object to the phrases, "Adamic death," "Adamic law," "first death," "special salvation," etc., which phrases are not found in the Bible. Such objectors do not scruple to say that "everlasting punishment" means "eternal death." They have no difficulty in talking about a "temporal death" either, but they seriously object to the phrase "eternal death," while at the same time they discard the doctrine of "everlasting torments." As "eternal death" is most strongly implied in the language of Scripture concerning the penalty of transgression, I adopt it.

"As by one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death passed upon all men, because that all have sinned." Unless a "Ransom" is provided all must perish eternally. A "Ransom" has been provided, "for God so loved that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life," and Christ "will raise him up at the last day." Hence Christ says of his followers, "I give unto them eternal life, and they shall never (not forever) perish," for he will raise them at the last day. It is true that "the death of the righteous" is a temporal death, while that of the wicked is an eternal death. One hath hope in his death, while the other has none, for "the wrath of God abideth on him." One has accepted of the offered salvation, and is accepted in the Beloved. The other rejects it, and he in turn is rejected and dies in his sins, for he "is condemned already," and "shall not see life." One has the "promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come," while the other "utterly perishes in (his) own corruption."

THE FREE GIFT.

"As by the offence of one judgment came upon all men to condemnation; even so by the righteousness of one the free gift came upon all men unto justification of life." (Rom. v. 18.) This verse is made use of by those who would have the wicked raised from the dead. "The free gift" which comes "upon all men to justification of life," they tell us, "applies to saint and sinner, and is the common salvation by a resurrection of all from the dead." So the sinner has "the free gift of justification of life," and our opponents say in the next breath, "justice demands that the sinner must be raised from the dead, in order that he may be put to death for his sins." Strange inconsistencies to save a theory! One moment it is Grace, and the next it is Debt. First it is a Gift, then it is a Curse.

The ridiculousness of such a position may be shown by the famous prison illustration. A prisoner in his cell is awaiting the punishment due for his crimes. The day of execution arrives, and the Warden visits the convict and tells him that he is "to be liberated from his cell and prison, and have the privilege once more of going out of doors, treading upon the green grass, beholding the glorious sun, and enjoying the pure air, as he goes to the scaffold." He may further say to him, "this unspeakable privilege of getting out of prison once more, is not on account of any merit on your part, but it is an act of grace on the part of the government, by which it shows 'unmerited love and favor' toward you. And now, you must go to the gallows and be hanged by the neck until you are dead, dead, dead." I am inclined to think that the convict would be exceedingly puzzled about the free gift. He would naturally think of the fable of "The Spider and the Fly," and say, "I pray thee, have me excused."

Rom. v. 15. "But not as the offence so also is the free gift." (Gr. KARISMA.)

Rom. v. 18. "The free gift came upon all men unto justification of life."

Rom. vi. 23. "The gift (Gr. KARISMA) of God is eternal life."

May the Lord help me, and help us all to "labor, and suffer reproach" for Christ and his Gospel. We "know in whom (we) have believed," and at last we shall receive "the end of (our) faith even the salvation of [our] souls." "Trust in the Lord."

THE PENALTY OF THE LAW.

WHAT IS IT? WITH THOUGHTS ON THE LIFE-PLAN.

BY MRS. L. R. K. BISHOP.

That it is death, few seem to deny: and yet there exists as great a diversity of opinion among religionists, as to what really constitutes the penalty of the divine law, as though that was not the fact. This becomes apparent when we notice the different definitions, each expressive of a peculiar idea, so commonly prefixed to the term death. Thus we have "Spiritual death," "second death," "eternal death," etc., the last of which expressions, only, will claim our attention in this article: and we come directly to the point.

Is eternal death, in the sense of being holden in death's embrace eternally, the penalty of that law under which man was originally placed? Let me here remark, first, that the penalty of the Adamic law, whatever it is, overshadows the entire race. For "by the offence of one judgment came upon all men unto condemnation." "By one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned." (All sinned in the person of him who was their God-appointed head, and representative.)

Secondly. Whatever view we take of the penalty; when the doctrine of Atonement claims our attention, we shall have to meet it: and there must be no clashing!

"THOU SHALT SURELY DIE;" or, "dying, thou shalt die," is the fearful language in which the penalty is couched. If this necessarily involves an eternal dissolution of being, then the race is lost; for redemption is out of the question, unless love and mercy can succeed in devising a plan, by which justice can be cheated out of his claims on man. But this would be getting up a kind of family-quarrel among the divine attributes, which cannot be allowed for a moment; and we look for another solution of the question.

That the life of the Adamic nature is forfeited to the law is evident. And when we admit that man has but one nature, and consequently but one life, it follows that when that life is yielded up, (unless he has become possessed of a life-principle not inherent in the Adamic nature) he must forever remain under the dominion of death: not because the law demands it, but as an inevitable consequence of giving to the law what it does demand,—the only life which he possesses.

Thus redemption becomes possible on conditions; while eternal dissolution of being, is absolutely certain, outside of those conditions.

If this view of penalty be correct, we shall find it confirmed when we come to consider the doctrine of Atonement: for we have more than intimated that our position here, must be met there.

Did Christ die "for our sins according to the scriptures?" then he suffered the penalty due to our sins. Was he "made in the likeness of sinful flesh?" then he gave to the law what it justly demanded of "sinful flesh." On what principle this was done, whether vicariously or otherwise, matters not just here; the fact itself is sufficient for our present purpose.

Did Christ die an eternal death for us? if so (we) are yet in (our) sins:" "they also that are fallen asleep in Christ, are perished." What then did he do? Just what the law demaded—he gave up the life of the Adamic nature—made an eternal surrender of the life of "sinful flesh." Thus he "magnified the law, and made it honorable," by giving it just what it claimed. But having in possession that quickening Spirit, which constitutes the life-principle of the divine nature; it was not possible for him to be holden of death; and God raised him from the dead.

Thus we find a harmony between the demands of law, and the propitiatory sacrifice made by Christ: and we have indicated the only condition on which man's redemption from death becomes possible, namely, the possession of a higher, a divine life. It was to bring this life within his reach, that God gave his only begotten Son. "I am come that they might have life, and that they might have that which is excellent," is His own gracious announcement.

"Christ died for our sins" truly; but this only proved that ours was a forfeited life. "If one died for all, then were all dead." It was his connection with us as the "Son of man," that brought death to him: but he "was declared to be the Son of God....by the resurrection from the dead." "He rose again for our justification." That is, his resurrection demonstrated that it is possible for us to live again, if we become connected with him, by being made a partaker of his divine nature.

What a plan is this,—that saves man, a creature of dust, by lifting him up, and bringing him into close relationship with God! That imparts to him the life-principle of the divine nature, the reception of which, while it insures to him a future life, at the same time creates him anew in Christ Jesus unto good works: thus enabling him to perfect such a character, as shall make that life a blessing.

This is the fruit of faith,—this the result of believing on Him who was "lifted up as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness." And

"How firm a foundation ye saints of the Lord,
Has been laid for our faith in his excellent word."

God was not content with giving line upon line, and precept upon precept; but he has crowned the whole, by sending his only begotten Son into the world, made in the likeness of sinful flesh, to illustrate in his own person, the practical working of that plan of life which he has presented for our acceptance.

A character has been perfected, beautiful in its symmetry—glorious in its perfections—a model for all coming time, to which all eyes may turn; and after which every heart may strive to pattern. 'Tis the character of the "Captain of our salvation:" and "suffering" was employed as an element in the discipline. How could it be otherwise? May sons were to be brought to glory through a world of suffering: could their Leader be fully qualified for his work—could he be a "perfect" Captain without suffering? "It became Him for whom are all things, and by whom are all things, in bringing many sons unto glory, to make the captain of their salvation perfect, through suffering." His feet have trodden every step of the way; and they who hope to attain unto "glory" at last, must expect to, follow their Captain!

Christ has also become our High Priest. And, (Oh, matchless condescension!) "It behooved him in all things to be made like unto his brethern, that he might be a merciful and faithful high priest,....for in that he suffered being tempted he is able to succour those that are tempted."

But if his life illustrated the plan of God, (for it taught us, that as he overcome the world, so may we by the use of corresponding means,) so did his death and resurrection. "The children were partakers of flesh and blood, he also himself likewise, took part in the same; that through death, he might destroy him that had the power of death....and deliver them who through fear of death, were all their life-time subject to bondage." Who that has named the name of Christ, does not know what this meaneth? Who that has looked the grim monster in the face,—that has gazed into the loathsome prison-house of mortality,—but has felt what a weight of fear, which hath torment, has been rolled away by the divinely attested fact, that One who bore our nature, has trodden the dark valley through, and opened a "resurrection gate" on the other side! Oh, what a plan of Life!

Talk infidelity to him whose creed is but a tissue of contradictions and absurdities! but never name it in the presence of one whose eyes have been enlighted to see the matchless beauty of such a plan as this! Whatever else he may be ignorrnt of, he knows that none but the high and the lofty One that inhabiteth eternity, could have devised it! The impress of his signet-ring is on it—it bears the tokens of its own divinity. How shall we escape, if we neglect this great salvation?

"I KNOW."

Mr. A. knows that God is an immaterial being, that he is in one place as much as another; he knows there are three persons in one God.

Mr. B. knows that Mr. A. is mistaken; that God is a being with a body; that he occupies space, and is omnipresent by his power and influence; he also knows the doctrine of the trinity is not true.

Mr. C. knows that Jesus had a pre-existence; he also knows that if a man does not believe that, he is an infidel.

Mr. D. knows that Jesus was born of the Virgin Mary; was circumcised when he was eight days old; that he did not have a pre-existence.

Mr. E. knows that man has an immortal soul.

Mr. F. knows that he has not.

Mr. G. knows that the soul is conscious when the man is dead.

Mr. H. knows that Mr. G. knows no such thing.

Mr. I. knows that all are to be raised to life at the last day.

Mr. J. knows that only the righteous will have a future life.

Mr. K. knows the Jews are to return to Jerusalem; that they are to exist again as a nation in the mortal state.

Mr. L knows they will not thus return; there is no such promise in the bible.

Mr. M. knows that after the coming of Christ nations are to exist, and there is to be a thousand years more or less of probation.

Mr. N. knows there is to be no such age.

Mr. O. knows that before you can be a christian you must be immersed in water.

Mr. P. knows that water baptism does not belong to this dispensation.

Mr. Q. is not a professor of religion, but he reads what all these men know; and, being a man of good sense, he knows that some of them do not know as much as they think they do.

BRETHREN:—It was not my object in writing the above to enlighten you as to what men know; the task would be too great if I knew, which I do not, and then the Herald could not contain it. Neither was it to intimate that we do not or can not know anything, (my private opinion is, however, that we know but little; and if we knew more, we should say by our actions and words that we knew less), but my object was to impress this idea—that a little modesty, mixed with charity, taken just before speaking or writing, might prove beneficial; it would I think cause us to know less and love more. I like our EDITOR because he is not disposed to "book for hell" those who do not say shibboleth just as he does; and while I write this, my prayer to God is, that he would give us all more of this spirit. I do not mean that which the Editor has, for he might not have enough to go round; but some, and a good supply, of the same sort. "I know" is too common among Adventists. Brethren, let our speech more frequently be "from the best evidence and light that I can get, I believe this or that to be true." I know that I love God and his people, and that I love the appearing of our Saviour Jesus Christ: beyond that I know but little, and mean to be content with having my opinion, and when I express that I desire to do it with meekness and fear.

BR. STORRS:—Clip, trim, blot out, add to or burn up, just as you think for the glory God and the good of the cause we love.

A. G. H.

NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—The note at the close of Br. H.'s article was not designed for the public; but we thought best to give it as a sample of the spirit, which, if more general, would lighten our labor, save personal feelings, and promote the cause of brotherly love. Some must not have a word altered, nor an expression left out, even though the sense is not changed; their articles must go in just as they wrote them; if not, they will write no more, and spend their time, afterward, in railing against the Editor, or, which is even worse, in throwing out sly insinuations against him, instead of coming to him, in a manly and christian manner, and consulting and counseling with him, to see if some way cannot be devised to ease the feelings of such as think they have ground of complaint. Let all "seek not our own, but the things which are Jesus Christ's;" so shall love and truth abound among us and the Lord be honored by us.

WESTERN MISSION.—No. 14.

BY W. S. CAMPBELL.

HORNSBY, ILL., Aug. 14, 1865.

In this place we have had a regular old fashioned battle for the truth. We had labored under circumstances embarrassing and trying; but have finally succeeded in breaking down the opposition, till the people are willing to hear us, generally, and excepting the Baptist church, are not only willing we should preach, but anxious to hear more of our doctrine. We had some warm friends to begin with; now we have many more.

On Thursday evening we failed to meet our engagement—and by it we found that the people who came out, were much disappointed, and it "appeared like" our preaching had become an institution.

This was the way of it. We suspended for Wednesday evening, that we might run down to Bunker Hill, by train, to arrange for a meeting in that neighborhood. We had a fine visit, withal. In the afternoon a team was coming to within five miles of Clyde, and we, poor fellows, concluded we could walk that five miles, and be in season for the meeting, thus saving the fare. Bunker Hill itself is one of the finest places in the West. On the high rolling prairie, to the North East, we had a magnificent view of a world of highly cultivated farms; the undulating prospect stretching away for fifteen miles, eastward and westward, with skirts of timber here and there; beautiful gems, dotted on the grand expanse, like shading touches to a luxuriant picture.

We travelled on, stepped down from our cross-board, at sundown. Poor time! Five miles to walk, on a prairie! Meeting at eight o'clock. Trudging on, the darkness of night settled upon us. No twilight on the prairie. Sundown! and darkness. In crossing a corner from the traveled road to the rail road track, Lewis said, we were lost. Lost on the prairie! The thought! I laughed. The north star was there. I knew the bearings. The distance is much more than five miles.

The polar star is quite suggestive. It stands over the Theological hemisphere, in the heaven of Revelation. It is the truth! With magnetic power the eye of the believer, like the unvarying needle, ever turns to its deep, undeviating, eternal, shining position. It is always there. Stars, systems, nebulae may revolve, nearer or more remote. It changes not! And perfect faith varies not. No mountains of iron error can cause a digression. And like a lone traveler on the night-covered plain, or storm-tossed mariners on the blue wave, each man, though solitary, may behold it as the appointment of his God; and shape his traveling pilgrimage thereby.—Clouds may for a time obscure the vision; his reckoning will be requisite; essential; but again after the trial, appearing in the north, making the Divine North, the same determinate star [truth] leads his path.

Having been reported infidel in our views, as is very often the case, by those who are ignorant, and wilfully remain so, I concluded that I would, on Friday evening, deliver a discourse on the Authenticity of the Holy Scriptures; especially taking the prophecies to prove their validity. The discourse showed that we believed the Bible understandingly, for we can bring arguments which are irresistible to prove that they are to be received as the Divine Word. Skeptics, spiritualists, and our hard-shell friends, became silent. My remarks were based on Isa. xli. 22, "Let them bring them forth, [their reasons] and show us what shall happen: let them show the former things, what they be; that we may consider them, and know the latter end of them; or declare us things for to come." It took revilers all aback. A Methodist minister was friendly, and invited to preach with us. He consented, with the understanding that we should be free. The Baptists obtained his consent to speak in their house, which they had kindly refused to me, when I first came. I heard him. He made a strong effort to show the immortality of the soul—the general resurrection—general judgment, and eternal torment. A great field for one sermon.

Then, on Sunday, my stand-point was definite. The congregation was good. All day we spake the words of truth, and by the divine aid, with power. The shafts from the Bible quiver took effect. We gained. Gained much in the afternoon. A trick to keep the people away did not succeed well. The evening came. We felt the victory when we began. By this time, sympathy was with us. At the close of service the triumph was complete. We had overthrown the arguments, and underminded the assumed philosophical positions planted against us. Overwhelmed in truth, all their pretended proofs and sophistries.

The people generally are waking up to our views—beginning to read the bible. Except the Baptists, aforesaid, we find people justify the course we have taken, and are being led to this inquiry in earnest. The old tumble-down forts of antiquated theological error shake and crash under bolts fired from the heavy ordinance of eternal veracity.

By the way, one Spiritualist, who heard me, said to Dr. Hinchman, "I will hear him no more." "Why?" said the doctor. He replied, "I believe, and all the sects, virtually, agree with me, that we are a part of God—God will not destroy himself; we are all safe." Well done, good heathenism!" Splendid Budhist philosophy! Will they continue the heathen arguments? They must, or confess they have none. And just see how the advocates of inherent immortality, unwittingly, are laying planks in the Spiritualist platform! It is our position that gives the alarm to skeptics of every class, and stirs up the back track and the broad-track professors to cry for their endangered pet, as did the Ephesian idolaters, "Great is Diana."

It has been believed, it is believed, it ought to be believed. This is a short way of stating a large amount of argumentation that is directed against us.

One thing more. I find that here, as in other places, there are some who almost entirely neglect the "Old Bible"—the old Testament being regarded as of little account in securing the knowledge of God. In fact it is not the knowledge of God that they seek, generally, among those who profess faith in Christ. It is to feel comfortable; to be kept, by fears, from doing that for which God would torment them; to be ready to die; to get into heaven; and they hardly know that the New Testament is true, or think how it can be true, if it answers to move them. How pitiable such ground looks, compared with the broad and elevated propositions and inquiries upon God's purposes which lead us to happiness by an increasing knowledge of himself.

This must suffice. It is "blue Monday." I must preach to-night. I told them they would most likely wish us to stay by the time we got ready to go. They now propose two or three weeks.

THE WAY OF LIFE.

BY MRS. LUCRETIA B. LAMB.

"As Moses lifted up the brazen serpent in the wilderness even so must the Son of Man be lifted up that whosoever believeth on him should not perish but have Eternal Life." What a striking similitude, and how apt and plain the figure as Jesus expressed it. The effect produced upon the bitten Israelites was death: those who looked to the serpent of brass lived. So all the human family possessing the Adamic nature are dying, perishing; not death spiritual, death of happiness, and death of virtue, as we often hear it represented; for spiritual life and purity of character no one ever received from Adam; but one tending to complete dissolution, perishing; there is in it no germ that will take root and bear fruit. In this condition whosoever looks to the Saviour lifted up, believing the record that eternal life is provided, and that this life is in the crucified Nazarene, will not perish.

Can anything be plainer? more easily comprehended by the weak minded? while the orthodox rendering of it mars its beauty and destroys the figure. If the creature lives on, though it be without happiness, and without virtue, he still lives, and is in no sense in the condition of the bitten Israelite; for the poison of the fiery serpent we know resulted in death. How harmonious are the revelations of truth when allowed to be their own interpreters.

Should we not fear to make void the truth of God by our own or others' traditions? Let God be true, although all else prove false. Did we look to a God of infinite love and power and yet he had failed to be true, where could be our confidence? A dreadful uncertainty would ever pervade our hearts, and we could not cry abba Father with unwavering devotion.

O, the blessed reality. God is true: what he has promised he will perform; and what he has threatened he will execute; and as the Israelites fell in the wilderness by the poisonous reptile, so will the poison of sin as surely result in death, unless by faith we behold Him who was made an offering for sin, rose again for our justification, and is now our prevailing Intercessor.

May we, Br. Storrs, together with all the readers of your valuable paper, so understand, believe, and obey the Divine record, that the poison of sin may give place to the Life-giving Spirit of the Lord Jesus: then incorruptibility and eternal life will ere long be ours through endless ages. Yours in love.

The Herald of Life.

NEW YORK, SEPTEMBER 6, 1865.

NO IMMORTALITY NOR FUTURE LIFE, EXCEPT IN JESUS CHRIST ALONE, AND BY A RESURRECTION AT THE LAST DAY IF DEAD, OR A CHANGE IF ALIVE.

The Editor at Home again.

We attended our Anniversary this year with much satisfaction, and had a pleasing interview with old friends, some of whom had not been with us in our previous meetings. We were specially gratified to have the company on the way and at Springfield of Br. Jacob Grim, who was first in advocating no life from the dead except by union with Christ, the Life-giver. We were glad, also, to have him appointed President of the Union, though he declined the office, but yielded to the wishes of the meeting. We were no less gratified by the appointment of Br. C. D. Leet, a tried and hearty friend to the cause, as Vice President. In short, we had a most harmonious and successful meeting. We all listened to complaints and suggestions patiently and in a christian spirit, and came to an understanding, in which there could hardly be said to be a dissenting voice or feeling. We thank our kind Father in heaven, and our blessed Life-giver for the happy result of this our anniversary. It is an omen of good to the cause that originated in love to the glorious theme of "Life in Christ alone;" a cause on which the Divine blessing has rested, hitherto, to the disappointment of its enemies and the wonder of its friends; and which will continue to prosper if those of us engaged in it "seek not our own, but the things that are Jesus Christ's." Let us all sink self into the will of God and the love of our Life-giver; so shall we honor Him who has called us into his vineyard, and has held up for our encouragement the hope of endless life in His presence and glory.

The pledges made this year, at our anniversary, fully sustain our declaration, in our last number of the Herald, that "Our friends know its value and importance too well to indulge for a moment the thought of permanent suspension or discontinuance." The Lord has raised up friends to this cause who hardly ask what it costs? but, Does truth demand the continued issue of the Herald of Life? That question settled—and it is settled—they go forward cheerfully in the work; and fifteen hundred dollars were pledged or raised at our meeting this year as easy as one thousand were last year; nor have all our friends yet spoken; we expect the whole $2500 embraced in the Resolution will come in by donations during the volume commencing October 4. Br. D. B. Salter, authorizes us to say, in addition to his pledge of $100 already made, he will be one of any number to pay $5 per month, the coming year, to sustain the Tract cause. With such a spirit among us, and relying on God for his blessing, we have no cause to be discouraged.

The price of the paper continues as it now is; but we trust all who are able to give more, will do as they have done the past year, that is, send three, four, or five dollars for their copy. But it is especially desirable that all should put forth an effort to increase the circulation of the Herald by procuring new subscribers, and by commencing immediately; otherwise they cannot be furnished with the complete numbers of the coming volume, as we shall not print more copies than our subscription list calls for. For the same reason our present subscribers should renew their subscriptions immediately: do not delay doing so till you find us unable to supply you with the early numbers of Vol. iii.

We shall send the present number to some who are not now subscribers: they may or may not have been so heretofore; but we invite them to become so, at least early enough to commence with the next volume, the first of October.

Our Annual Meeting.

Came together at the call of the Secretary, Br. J. T. Curry, at Rice's Hall, Springfield, Mass. Aug. 25, 1865.

We were especially glad to be present at the yearly meeting of the "Life and Advent Union," for several reasons. Among them are the following:

1. Long absence does sometimes, to some extent at least, and especially in the time in the history of the world in which we live, alienate even friendly hearts. The present age of the world is characterized by infidelity, not only as respects bible truth, and practical christianity, but men are unfaithful to each other. "Deceiving, and being deceived" is a marked character of the time.

It is very natural as we engage in the busy avocations of life, and are constantly thrown in contact with the various forms of wickedness so prevalent in this last time, for us to distruct humanity altogether, and from slight causes become suspicious of even our friends. Frequent reunions are therefore of the greatest importance in reassuring our hearts of the honest integrity, and conscientious uprightness of our dear fellow laborers in the great work of spreading abroad a knowledge of the glorious gospel of Christ.

Previous to our meeting at Springfield, some slight misunderstanding had come to exist with some of us; but after a full, free, and plain statement of all our difficulties, we were satisfied that all our mistakes were simply errors in judgment; and a mutual spirit of forbearance and christian charity was felt by all, and was manifested by an earnest desire of all to "confess their faults one to another," and "forgive as they hoped to be forgiven." Our confidence was greatly strengthened in the high toned christian integrity of our dear brethren, by the earnestness manifested by all to right all seeming wrongs. No one could be at such a meeting without feeling the deepest sense of gratitude to God for the privilege of being associated with such a class of men. We went away from the meeting with a deeper sense than ever before of the great importance of "forbearing one another in love."

2. It was truly gratifying to all present to witness the great love manifested by our brethren for the glorious doctrine of a future life only in Christ. This was manifested in the hearty expressions of unabated, and constantly increasing confidence in our advanced position on this great and important subject; declarations that would, could they have been there, caused the tongues to cleave to the roof of their mouths, of those who, to discourage honest brethren, have reported that some of us have "given it all up:" but this love was also manifested in a substantial way by the pledging of abundant funds to carry forward the great work.

We felt that we had passed the trial; and the experiment, (if experiment it might be called, of attempting to sustain a paper devoted expressly to the advocacy of life in Christ alone) had now proved abundantly successful. We say to our brethren scattered abroad, take courage; the "Herad of Life and of the Coming Kingdom" is destined to live, in spite of the gloomy forebodings of some of its friends, and the doleful prophesyings of those who would be glad to see it die; and we trust it will, by the blessing of God and the hearty co-operation of all who ought to help fill its columns with good matter, be such a paper as we shall all love to read.

Lastly, we were glad to be present at the meeting and see face to face those earnest men, who, at the sacrifice of earthly good and greatness, are bending all the energies with which God has endowed them, in pushing forward the great work in which we are all so heartily engaged. God bless those liberal, faithful men, and reward them with eternal life. Amen.

S. W. Bishop.

Anniversary of the Union.

Minutes of the Annual Meeting of the Life and Advent Union, held in Rice's Hall, Springfield, Mass., Aug. 25, 1865.

Union called to order by the President at 2 P. M. Prayer by Br. Bishop.

On motion, the Constitution was read by the Secretary.

The Secretary was directed to read all letters that had been received from Correspondents to the meeting.

Treasurer's report was read, received, and adopted.

The Business Agent made a verbal statement of the business affairs. Received and adopted.

Voted—that the Union devote itself to interchange of views in regard to the past and future management of the paper. Remarks were made by Brethren Wendell, Grim, Bishop, Hanford, Clapp, of Hartford, Curry and Storrs. Strictures were made on the course of the paper during the past year; more especially in relation to some improprieties of expression in certain articles that had been published. Explanations and concessions were made, and harmony renewed in a most satisfactory and gratifying manner.

The second Article of the Constitution was amended by striking out the parenthetic words

The third Article of the Constitution was amended by the substitution of the word "five" for the word "seventeen." The fifth Article of the Constitution being thus rendered needless, was expunded.

The Union proceeded to elect officers for the ensuing year. The following were elected: President, Jacob Grim, of Philadelphia; Vice President, C. D. Leet, of Springfield, Mass.; Secretary, Rufus Wendell; Treasurer, Leonard C. Thorne, of New York; Directors, William H. Thorne, Richard Martin, John Kemp, George H. Carroll, A. W. Macdonald, all of New York. George Storrs was re-elected Editor by acclamation.

Voted that the sum of two thousand and five hundred dollars be raised by contribution for the Herald of Life and the Tract fund.

The following resolution was then passed: Resolved, that the Life and Advent Union tenders to Br. W. S. Campbell, its Missionary in the West, its heartfelt thanks, for his abundant and efficient labors, and assures him of its warmest sympathies and earnest cooperation in the future.

Adjourned.

The following letters were sent to and read before the Union:

From Eld. Jonathan Wilson.

My epistle of love to the Antitypical Bethlehemite family which is to meet at Rice's Hall, Springfield, Mass., Aug. 25, 1865, at 2 P. M, for their yearly meeting, whose chronology is on record 1 Samuel from the sixteenth chapter to the end of the book. I feel happy, brethren, that you have accounted me worthy to have my name on record among yours in the Herald of Life, on the principle of the Bible doctrine of no future life out of Christ; but having an undoubted fact that it is on record in the Lamb's book of life, I have joy unspeakable and full of glory. A resurrection or translation affects alike all who experience either, to change their natures and vile bodies to be like unto Christ's glorious body. Phil. iii. 21. Neither is there salvation in any other from the dominion of death; for there is none other name under heaven given, among men, whereby we must be saved. To bring the righteous to their reward uses up the whole gospel system of resurrection; so death alone must be the reward of the wicked. This is confirmed by the declarations of Christ to his disciples. "He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting lasting life, and he that believeth not the Son shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on him." John iii. 36. "And Jesus came and spake unto them, saying, All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth. Go ye, therefore and teach all nations, baptizing," etc. "He that hath the Son hath life, and he that hath not the Son of God hath not life." 1 John v. 12. "Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you"—that is, no life principle in you. "He that eateth my flesh," etc., "I will raise him up at the last day," John vi. 54. Mark says his commission was—"He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved, but he that believeth not shall be damned," and I think, without a resurrection. Mark xvi. 16. Paul says "the wages of sin is death," and does not give the wicked a resurrection as any part of that death. Rom. vi. 23.

Now for Old Testament witnesses for no life out of Christ. David says, "Yet a little while, and the wicked shall not be: yea, thou shalt diligently consider his place, and it shall not be"—he has no place. Psa. xxxvii. 10. Solomon says, "The man that wandereth out of the way of understanding shall remain in the congregation of the dead." Prov. xxi. 16 Isaiah says of the rulers of Babylon, "They are dead, they shall not live, they are deceased, they shall not rise; therefore hast thou visited and destroyed them, and made all their memory to perish." Isa. xxvi. 14. Jeremiah says of the princes of Babylon, "They shall sleep a perpetual sleep, and not awake, saith the King whose name is the Lord of hosts." Jer. li. 37.

Now, brethren, hear the conclusion of the whole matter. God made man with reasoning faculties, gave him a probationary law to develop a moral character, worthy of that world and a resurrection from the dead. But man sinned, and lost the only chance he had to that spiritual world. Christ offered himself a sacrifice, not to pay the demand for the sinner, but to magnify the law and make it honorable, that God might be just, and the justifier of him that believeth in Jesus, so as to convey him on his railroad car of resurrection or translation. But no passage for any but those who have a through ticket before the trump sounds or car whistles, "All ready." Their ticket reads thus: "All who are worthy of that world and resurrection from the dead;" such have the insurance for eternal life in that world. Luke xx, 35. Brethren, get your tickets ready; evidences thicken that we shal soon hear the resurrection car; for it blows first, then the translation: but no blast for the impenitent wicked. Thus God will gather all the Bethlehem family together with Abraham's children of promise into one family in the Kingdom of God. Amen and amen.

J. W., the 89 year old pilgrim, yet alive while on the ground.

From Charles and Polly G. Pitts

Fredericksburg, Iowa, Aug. 15, 1865.

To the dear Brothers and Sisters assembled at the Annual Meeting of the "Life and Advent Union;" greeting:—May the Great Head of the church preside over all your deliberations, and give you, all, the wisdom that is from above, that your ruling motive may be God's glory and the spreading of the living truth, as it is in Jesus, amongst your fellow men. Now friends, if it will benefit our fellow men by telling our sentiments we shall be glad to do it; for, freely we have received; God grant that we may freely give. We believe God has offered a sacrifice once for all; and we believe that we have made a covenant with our God by that sacrifice, and that our hand of faith is constantly hold on that sacrifice, the Lamb of God; and the blood of that sacrifice will cleanse from all sin; therefore our sins are remitted, and we are justified before God. This is our faith; and as faith is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen, our hope is substantial, and like an anchor to our soul, and takes hold on Christ, the only Life-giver that is given to man; for, there is no other name under heaven, given among men, whereby we can have life, (Syriac); so he that hath the Son, hath life; the life that is hidden with Christ in God; and is to be revealed when He that is our life shall appear. So he that hath not the Son shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on him. He is holden by the cords of his sins, and shall utterly perish in his own corruption. He has sown to the flesh, and it is impossible for him to reap that which he has not sown. He that soweth to the Spirit shall of the Spirit reap life everlasting. As under the ceremonial law, he that brought not up to the tabernacle his sacrifice in the course of the year, that soul was cut off from his people; there was no blood of atonement, and the High Priest entering into the holiest of all, at the end of the year, could not blot out his sins; therefore his sin remained, there was no justification, no remittance; and as the wages of sin is death, and he had not been begotten by the incorruptable seed, he must of necessity remain in the dominion of death; in the congregation of the dead. We believe Paul's discourse in 1 Cor. xv., was on the resurrection of all the dead that ever will be raised. For the dead that are to be raised, are in Christ, and are to be raised to glory; and if the wicked are included in that resurrection, universal salvation is true. But the force of Paul's great argument is this, "If there is no resurrection, there is no future life. Therefore we labor, that whither waking or sleeping, we may be found in Him."

Dear friends, we love life, but dread death; we love even this mortal life, because God hath set us for the defence of the gospel, and blessed be his holy name. We do hope to live till our Life-giver comes; but whether we wake or sleep, may God grant that we may all be found in him.

Your Brother and Sister, waiting for immortality when our Lord returns.

From D. Edson Smith.

Vesper, N. Y., Aug. 18, 1865.

To the members of the Life and Advent Union, Greeting: It would afford me great pleasure to be with you at "Our Annual Meeting;" but circumstances will not permit. So, in accordance with Br. Curry's suggestion, I send you these few lines, to assure you of my hearty cooperation during the coming campaign. I am also in favor of a vigorous and energetic prosecution of the work. We are evidently in the last days of this age, and there is an accumulated mass of labor to be done that would stagger any but those whose trust was firmly fixed on God. Centuries of accumulated error and superstition have got to be cleared away, and a noble superstructure reared in its stead. In order to accomplish this, various sorts of workmen are needed. Some to publish the paper and tracts; some to write tracts and articles for the paper; others to go through the length and breadth of the land, and sound aloud the glad tidings, of Life from the dead by a connection with Christ the great Life-giver. And still another large army is needed to procure means to aid the others in their labors. There is a place for all, and all are essential.

As for me, I pledge myself entirely for the work, and feel willing to take any place, from a "hewer of wood to a drawer of water." Br. R. Cadwell, of Preble, N. Y., advises me to go South, and offers to give me material aid; and as I have a great desire to go, I propose starting in October. Pray for me. I trust the time will soon come when believers in Life only through Christ will have a Freedmen's mission under their own auspices.

The cry is being raised that advocating Life from the dead only through Christ makes none any better. But brethren and sisters this is not true. We are to be sanctified through the truth, and the more truth we have the better fitted we are for the responsibilities of life. Thousands of Christians are yearly returning to their wallowing in the mire for the lack of these great truths which we hold. Brethren grow in grace and in the knowledge of the truth; so that an abundant entrance may be administered to you into the everlasting kingdom of God. Your Br. in Christ.

From F. Gladding.

Albany, N. Y., Aug. 20, 1865.

Dear Brother Curry:—I should love dearly to attend the Annual Meeting of the Life and Advent Union; but as circumstances will prevent I accept your proposition to write a few lines.

The idea of no future life for the wicked seemed for some time to be in direct opposition to some passages of Scripture; but light has broken in upon my mind, and I now see clearly the beauty and glory of this crowning truth and rejoice to hear of its spread in different parts of our land. Would that all could hear and receive the truth as it is in Jesus. The doctrine of Life only in Christ has been preached by yourself and others in this city; but the little band thinned out by death and removals is now without a place to meet and talk over the glad tidings of the last days. The perusal of the Herald of Life is a source of great pleasure to me in my present situation, and I hope also of some profit. May its Editor be abundantly blessed and strengthened for the performance of his arduous labors, and see much of the fruit thereof.

Br. Campbell's reports are encouraging: hope he may be sustained in his Missionary work and have many souls given him as stars in his crown. Hoping and praying that God will bless you and all engaged in the meeting, I subscribe myself your friend and brother in Christ, waiting for his coming.

From La Fayette Norris.

Campton, Iowa, Aug. 13, 1865.

Dear Brethren and Sisters of the Life and Advent Union: Very much indeed would I like to be with you in your yearly gathering, and enjoy for once, in long years past and gone, a meeting of christians. I know it would strengthen me in my Master's cause. But, although I cannot be there, I hope and pray your meeting may be so interesting and profitable as to have an influence that shall reach even to Iowa, and so bless me where I am.

In thinking over what would be best to be done at your meeting, my mind is that your first care should be to see that the Herald of Life is sustained. I pledge three dollars for that purpose, and I will pay more if necessary. Your next care should be to sustain as much missionary labor as possible. I have no suggestions to make as to how this isto be done, except to pay in money or give pledges for the same to be paid quarterly. If you want a pledge from me of this kind, you can have it.

My mind has been in a state of perplexity of late, as to how I ought to spend the money that I could spare for the furtherance of the gospel; whether to spend it in spreading the truth in my own vicinity, as best I could, or to send the money to some missionary that is in the field. The enemies of truth are terribly strong here, and I am almost alone, but I will do as you suggest in this matter.

I hope your meeting will arouse to renewed action those who love the truth, but hold too tight a grip on their treasures. Let them beware lest they fall into the snare of satan.

I close by expressing the hope that I shall meet you in the kingdom of God, where we shall form a friendship for each other that shall be lasting as eternity.

From Eld. Thomas T. Jenks.

Mount Carmel, Conn., Aug. 21, 1865.

Dear Br. Curry:—At this time of writing I do not expect to have the pleasure of meeting with you and the dear friends of "No Life out of Christ" on the 25th. Be assured however that I am with you heart and hand. I feel that the "Herald of Life" must be sustained. No other paper can supply its place with me. My means are rather limited, but I shall endeavor to do something for the good cause. My prayer is that the blessing of heaven may rest upon the meeting and give direction to all your deliberations.

From Ira Fancher.

Sandy Hill, N. Y., Aug. 23, 1865.

Yes, Dear Brs. and Sisters of like precious faith, until I was forty years old I really believed that every wicked person, as soon as they died, went to hell torment, instanter. Then, for about fifteen years, I believed that the wicked would sleep till Christ comes, then they would be resurrected and suffer a while and end in death, which now seems to me like a short stub limb of the eternal torment doctrine. But for the last two years I have had great joy in believing that the goodness of God leads men to repentance; and that the Psalmist told the truth when he said, "Man being in honor and understandeth not, is like the beasts that perish;" or Isa. xxvi. 14, "They are deceased they shall not rise; therefore hast thou visited (not going to) and destroyed them, and made all their memory to perish." But on the other hand, if the wicked are raised to life, or as the Saviour says in Luke xx. 35, "But they which shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world and the resurrection from the dead, neither marry nor are given in marriage, neither can they die any more, for they are equal unto the angels and are the children of God being the children of the resurrection." Now, if the wicked are in this class, truly it would make good universal salvation. But I neither believe in universal salvation nor in "short stub" torment; but that God will make a total and eternal end of all the ungodly. Amen.

From James Crawford.

Roxbury, Mass., Aug. 20, 1865.

Br. Curry:—I see by the Herald of Life an invitation given to all interested in the object of the Conference, to send in their view, and thus speak, although not present. My mind has been somewhat exercised upon the importance of a Oneness in Christ. That ought to be the signal of those that are in the advance of all conservative believers, in bringing out, in these last days, those most important truths that the friends of unholy union have endeavored to cover in oblivion. As the Spirit of truth leads men into all truth, it becomes us as the followers of the Spirit, to speak to a dying generation those truths that God in his providence has placed in our hands. To receive the light and not let it shine, is to transform ourselves from light to darkness, and from a state of justification to that of condemnation, and if we only were the sufferers,
